and declare "full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason against the United States, or of adhering to their enemies during the late civil war, with the restoration of all rights, privileges, and immunities, under the Constitution and laws which have been made in pursuance thereof." This proclamation purports to have been made "by virtue of the power and authority in me"—that is, the President—"vested by the Constitution and in the name of the sovereign people of the United States." I doubt, myself, any power of the executive department to issue a proclamation of that kind to be effectual.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very glad that the Senator from Connecticut has called the attention of the Senate to this subject. I entirely concur with him as to the importance and gravity of the question thus presented, and I hope the committee to whom this resolution will be referred—I suppose it will be the Judiciary Committee—will make a very thorough—

Mr. FERRY. This is a call on the President for information, and upon the reply of the President, that, I suppose, will be referred to the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall take some step to satisfy ourselves in the first place, for that is perhaps most important, and the country as to the legal right of the President of the United States to issue such a proclamation, founded, as it appears to be, solely upon the language of the Constitution itself. It has become rather important, I apprehend, that the people of the United States should understand whether or not the Executive of the United States has a dispensing power; whether he can, after the commission of an offense such as treason, or murder, or whatever it may be, by a proclamation, or by anything else in the form of a pardon, take away from the ordinary courts of the country jurisdiction to try and punish such offense or offenses. For one, sir, I am very free to say that I do not believe that he possesses any such authority, and that the authority which he has here attempted to exercise is entirely unwarranted by the Constitution of the United States. It seems to have been a sort of Christmas present to the recent president of the confederate States of America and his confederates. I hope this body will make a thorough and careful investigation of this great question, and that we shall endeavor to settle it at least in our own minds, for it is one of great gravity and importance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose the question is more important as a question fixing the powers of the Government than as to its results upon the persons whom it is intended to benefit by this proclamation. I am glad the subject has been stirred up, for I think it very important. I do not find in the Constitution any power given to the President to grant an amnesty at all. The word is not used in the Constitution. The Constitution does authorize the President to grant pardons in cases of offenses. Now, what an offense is is the question. By the law of England, inasmuch as the king is the sovereign and the offense is committed against the sovereign, I think the cases show that he has a right to grant pardons before conviction. That has been very much questioned in this country. I think in a case in the State of New York Governor Seward refused to exercise that power until there had been a conviction. But the case in this country is not only different from the cases in England, inasmuch as the Executive here does not represent the sovereign. The suit is not "The President of the United States against A. B.," as it is "The king against A. B." Therefore the whole subject, inasmuch as it affects the principles of our Government rather than because it is proposed to pardon those whom perhaps it is too late to punish, ought to be investigated.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am neither disposed nor prepared to discuss this subject now, but I wish to make a remark suggested by the observations of the honorable Senator from New Jersey. I think in recent years in England it has never been insisted that the king had a right by general proclamation, nominating nobody but applying to everybody suspected of certain species of crime, to exercise what the Senator from Michigan calls a dispensing power. Yet the assertion of such a power is implied by the proclamation of the President; he insists, not that he has a right to pardon or reprieve A B, or to forego his punishment, he being charged but not convicted of an offense; ignoring individuals and instances he assumes to dispense amnesty to communities. The power thus insisted on is very broad and very high. In England such acts have been in modern times embodied in public laws, in acts of Parliament alone. Such great dispensations have been claimed by the British people as their own prerogative—a prerogative above the Crown.

If the President has this authority it resides in the Constitution of the United States. It is conveyed in familiar words—words oft-repeated in other constitutions and laws. The Governor of the State of New York, for instance, has, I think, the same power, conveyed in identical words. To illustrate, then: under words like these, construed by the President, the Governor of the State of New York may not only pardon A B, C D, and E F, culprits charged but not convicted of offense, but he may proclaim or ordain or enact that all persons whatsoever at the time suspected of murder, arson, treason, and burglary be forever invested with immunity from punishment.

If such a power resides in the Executive of the State of New York under equivalent terms it has never, I think, dawned upon the imagination or speculation of any human being. On the contrary, if in time of peace, executing his civil and executive functions alone, the Executive of that State had ventured upon such a proposition, I think I am not mistaken in supposing it would have shocked the public judgment and the public sense.

The argument is not that the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief, or in any other capacity during a war, may make terms with public enemies or military offenders; but that in time of peace, as to any felony whatsoever, murder on the high seas, rifling the mails, or the other acts denounced as crimes in the national jurisprudence, he may interpose in no case in particular, but in all cases in general, without in any way individualizing them by a public act or edict, in effect by a public law of amnesty, and forego and forever bar all prosecutions for past offenses.

As I said, I do not wish to discuss the question now. I rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the honorable Senator from New Jersey to the fact that the act of the President is a step in advance of the ground referred to by him as held in England or in this country.

The inquiry is not whether the Executive has power to pardon before conviction in one case or in any number of individual cases. It is a question far in advance of that, far wider than that. Such a power must be spelled out by a process more extended and difficult than that resorted to in establishing the right by pardon to outrun the conviction of a culprit, or of any number of culprits treated as individuals.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I should not engage in this discussion or express any opinion whatever on the question if Senators had been content to ask for the information without going into the discussion; but on this subject nothing is more clear than that it has been expressly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that under the clause in the Constitution which gives the President the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment, the President has the power, at any time after the offense has been committed, before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, as well as after judgment and conviction, to grant pardon by general proclamation; and that this benign prerogative of clemency which the Constitution of the United States has reposed in the President, and in which the President does represent the sovereign people of the United States, cannot be limited by Congress or subjected by Congress to any restrictions whatever.

Mr. CONKLING. In what case was that decided?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Garland, where the court held clearly and unequivocally that by general proclamation the President could pardon offenses.

Sir, it is premature to enter on a general discussion of this question, but I did not think it right that the matter should leave the Senate and go out to the country with the expression of the opinion of Senators that there was some doubt as to the power of the President. I shall not go into the discussion at length nor take up any further time. I simply state the fact of the decision. I have sent for the volume containing the decision in Garland's case, and there is one other case which came before the court prior to that, where the principle to which I have referred was expressly decided. In Garland's case Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, uses language which, I think, I quote almost verbatim, if not entire, wherein he says, speaking for the court, that this is a power which may be exercised at any time before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, as well as after judgment and conviction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that that was decided by the Supreme Court years ago. It has been the practice of the country for fifty years to pardon before conviction as well as after.

Mr. FERRY and others. There is no question of that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I supposed so. There is no question, Senators say, that the President may, before any legal proceedings are taken, grant reprieve or pardon, and that he may during their pendency grant it as well as after judgment and conviction. And if the President has power to do it before legal proceedings are taken, what is the objection to his stating in a general proclamation that he grants reprieve and pardon to those who have been engaged in a given offense?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is another question.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. Does he state that in the Garland case, or any other case of which he knows, he understands that the Supreme Court has said that the President may do this thing of which we are speaking; that is, by general proclamation dispense to persons not named what the Senator from Michigan called an indulgence?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The case arising in the Supreme Court was, I think, a case which arose under just such a general proclamation. The man was not pardoned by name; he was pardoned under a general proclamation of amnesty.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator say that the Supreme Court decided this question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Nobody raised this question. It is a mere question of form. It is "sticking in the bark." If the President has the power to pardon every man who has been guilty of an offense, he can name those men one by one, or in general words he can say, "I pardon them all." Is it to be supposed that in the exercise of a constitutional power, where the Constitution gives the President the power without any limitation and the courts say expressly in their opinion that Congress has no authority to limit it—is it to be supposed that the mere form of exercising it makes any difference? It is a power reposed in the President, and reposed in the President by the Constitution, and the Constitution is just as much above Congress as it is above the President; and when the Constitution has reposed in the President this power it is not for Congress to usurp the right to limit it when it is given unlimited by the Constitution. There is but one restriction upon it, and that is with reference to cases of impeachment.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator a single question. The proclamation declares a full pardon and amnesty. Does the Senator from Wisconsin make any distinction between a pardon and an amnesty?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I conceive that the word "reprieve" and the word "pardon" contained in the Constitution are the words which will cover all that is meant by the word "amnesty."

Mr. FERRY. There I differ from the Senator entirely.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But if the President has power to pardon all persons who have been engaged in a common offense, suppose six have been engaged in it, is it necessary that he should name those six in the paper-writing by which he extends to them their pardon, or may he say that he pardons all those persons who were engaged in that offense? What is the difference? There is no difference in effect. True, the Supreme Court did not decide that precise question, for nobody raised that question in the court; nobody thought of raising it. It is too immaterial a question whether the men be named by name Richard Roe, John Doe, and John Jones, who have been engaged in the commission of an offense, or whether the President says in general language, "I pardon the men who were engaged in that offense, and all the men who were engaged in it." It makes no difference whatever. If the power is in him to do it; if he has expressed his intention to do it in a form which can be understood by the plainest common sense, it gives effect to it. There is no ambiguity about it. There is no doubt about the meaning.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to be drawn into a discussion which I deprecated in the beginning, and I would not have expressed these opinions on the subject but that I did not desire the opinions of other Senators which have been expressed to go out without notice.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think the resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Connecticut a very proper one, and I think that he very properly proposed the direction which it should take. It seems to me that the debate which has sprung up on it is premature, and that Senators ought not to have gone into the discussion of a question of so much moment and gravity without full research and reflection. I will, however, make one or two general remarks.

Everything that the President may do in the way of pardon or amnesty must be covered by the words expressed in the Constitution. If an amnesty is a different matter from what those words in their literal meaning and spirit were meant to comprehend, of course the President has no power to grant general amnesty.

I will remark, further, that the whole power of reprieve, and pardon, and amnesty, if you please, is vested by the Constitution in the Executive, the President of the United States, and that Congress has no authority under the Constitution to exercise one particle of the power of pardon, reprieve, and amnesty. If "amnesty" is simply the synonym of "reprieve and pardon," the power of amnesty is vested exclusively in the President of the United States. If it is not vested in him it does not exist in our Government at all. All the authority, all the power of the Government appertaining to that subject, is vested in the President, and in the President alone, according to my reading and understanding of the Constitution.

The honorable Senator from New York, I think, fails to illustrate this subject when he speaks of the attempted exercise of the power of amnesty or pardon before the offense is committed. Every man will concede that whether the power may be exercised before or after trial it cannot be exercised before the act of crime; and therefore the argument drawn from that supposed analogy of the honorable Senator from New York I think has no application.

In relation to the point suggested by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, whether a pardon may be granted by the chief executive officer of the nation or of a State before trial and after an offense is committed, I conceive there cannot be a doubt. The power is exercised of pardoning before trial in most of the States; and whether it should be exercised before or after trial in my mind is more a question of expediency than of power. The only point upon which my mind at present feels any hesitancy at all is the power of pardon by description without naming the individual or individuals pardoned; and upon that proposition I have not much doubt, but I am disposed to concur in the opinions expressed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin.

Of the power of the President to pardon for a crime or an offense before the trial of the party who has committed the crime or offense I entertain no doubt; and I do not entertain much doubt that where a particular crime has been committed by a large number of individuals, the President, by his proclamation, as well as by his writ of pardon, naming individually each person who has committed the offense, may grant a pardon under the name and phrase of "pardon and amnesty." And if the terms used in the proclamation be of such a character as certainly to comprehend and include a large class of persons who have committed a particular offense, it is, under our Government, a legitimate and constitutional exercise of power by the Executive.

But, Mr. President, I would have preferred that this grave subject had been postponed in its discussion and examination until Senators could come into the Chamber after mature investigation and deliberation, fully prepared to give the most considerate judgment upon so important a question.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I concur with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that this debate is premature, and I wish to take to myself a full share of the not discountenanced censure which he visits upon it. Nevertheless I should not like to sit down under the added weight of condemnation implied by the remarks of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] If he is right in all he told the Senate, a rude offense has been committed by me in thrusting crude and unconsidered suggestions upon the attention of the Senate.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin denounces as those who "stick in the bark" all such as think they see a grave distinction between the power to pardon A B charged with a given offense, and the power to put forth a general sweeping act of condonation toward all men collectively suspected or guilty of similar offenses. The men who have made England's history illustrious, according to the Senator, stuck in the bark when they set up great landmarks on the path of constitutional liberty. They deemed such distinctions as the Senator disparages so grave that their arguments and protests shook the British throne.

But we are told that besides being trivial the whole matter has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court, and so is not open to debate.

The Senator said the very question and all of it had been passed upon in Garland's case. That was his first declaration; and when pressed with inquiry he says the court did not decide this precise question, because nobody raised it; but the court did decide that the power of pardon and reprieve was well exercised when a general amnesty had been proclaimed naming nobody. He said it was under such a proclamation of amnesty that Garland claimed immunity. I have the case before me. Let us see whether the Senator is right. I read from the statement of facts:

"In July, 1865, Mr. Garland received from the President a pardon, by which the Chief Magistrate, reciting that Mr. Garland 'by taking part in the late rebellion against the Government, had made himself liable to heavy pains and penalties,' &c., did thereby 'Grant to the said A. H. Garland a full pardon and amnesty for all offenses by him committed, arising from participation, direct or implied, in the said rebellion, conditioned as follows: this pardon to begin and take effect from the day on which the said A. H. Garland shall take the oath prescribed,' &c."

Thus the Senator will see that he is widely mistaken in supposing that any such point as this could have been in judgment. The simple question was whether Garland, having taken part in adopting the ordinance of secession of his State, and being disqualified by the statute on account of that act, could be pardoned by the President of the United States before he had been judicially ascertained to be guilty. What did the court say on that question? Nothing more than was conceded by the honorable Senator from New Jersey. Just what has been said in England, and what was said by the Supreme Court, in effect, long ago. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Field, and this is the language as to the power to grant pardons:

"The power thus conferred is unlimited, with the exception stated. It extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment."

That is all that the case decided, all that the case could have decided. Thus you see, Mr. President, that no light has fallen upon the question whether an Executive, of his own motion, without a statute enabling him, may put forth a public act of amnesty. I do not mean, as the Senator from Kentucky seems to suppose, to illustrate this by taking the case of a pardon in advance of offenses not already committed or charged. I made no such suggestion. I agree with him that such an act of pardon would present still other questions. The point, I repeat again, is not whether the President may pardon an individual or different individuals charged with an offense or offenses, but whether he may acquit all men collectively and all communities charged with offenses, and this by a public proclamation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the case referred to, that of Garland, I agree that a pardon was granted to him by name. When I was on the floor before I was under the apprehension that he came in under the general pardon which was granted to certain classes of offenders. In that it seems that I was mistaken. But the language made use of by Mr. Justice Field in delivering the opinion of the court is almost verbatim what I repeated when on the floor before, and I am not, therefore, under the necessity of repeating it again. He decides the point that the power of the President to pardon and grant reprieves, except in cases of impeachment, is unlimited. The Constitution does not say that he can grant a pardon to A B by name, or C D by name, but that his power to grant pardon for an offense against the laws of the United States is unlimited. What is the offense here? Treason against the Government of the United States. The President has the unlimited power to pardon those who are guilty of it. If he has the power to pardon one he has the power to pardon two or six or one hundred or one thousand, and he can do it all in one act. By one act of the executive will he can pardon a thousand. All that the honorable Senator contends for is this: that he must name them in order to give effect to the pardon. Why, sir, that is not necessary at all. If he has the power to pardon a thousand men who have been engaged in rebellion, he may name them, it is true, but if he does not name them, but uses general terms to pardon all who were engaged in the late rebellion, of course "all" embraces those who would be named.

Mr. President, I have no intention to take up time nor to discuss this question prematurely; but inasmuch as some Senators had expressed such a decided opinion that this was an unconstitutional exercise of power on the part of the President I desired not to allow this resolution to pass from the Senate without expressing my opinion on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

PACIFIC RAILROAD REPORTS.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is respectfully requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the last annual reports of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its several branches, required by the twentieth section of the act of July, 1862; that he also communicate to the Senate copies of any report or reports made to him, or now in his possession, from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and all reports of engineers, superintendents, or other officers who make, annually, reports to any of the three last-named railroad companies.

FORTIFICATIONS AT LAWRENCE.

Mr. ROSS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the Senate such information as is furnished by the files of the War Department in relation to the erection of fortifications at Lawrence, Kansas, in 1864 and 1865.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 722) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," by extending certain penalties to accessories; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the reference of that bill to the Committee on Finance. It might go properly either to the Committee on Finance or to the Committee on the Judiciary; but considering that the Finance Committee has jurisdiction of the general subject I move its reference to that committee, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 723) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 724) to declare the meaning of the first section of an act entitled "An act in relation to the competency of witnesses, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 725) to regulate prosecutions under the laws of the United States for embezzling, and kindred offenses; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 726) to authorize imprisonment with hard labor as a punishment in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 727) to provide for the trial and punishment of accessories to criminal offenses; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 728) to repeal the act of February 28, 1803, prohibiting the importation of certain persons into certain States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed; and in making that motion I would say that the act which I propose to repeal is one of the old pro-slavery enactments which still lurk in our statute book, and it ought to be expelled.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 729) to provide for the execution in the District of Columbia of commissions issued by the courts of the States and Territories of the United States, and of foreign nations, and for taking depositions to be used in such courts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 730) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to confirm the titles to certain lands in the State of Nebraska;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 731) to authorize the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company to land its submarine cable upon the shores of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 732) to declare certain post roads in the State of Nevada; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 733) to enable the people of Georgia to form a State government republican in form; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 734) to create an additional collection district in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 735) to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and to protect the inhabitants thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 736) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Mexico; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 737) to incorporate the Central Indian Railroad Company in the Indian territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 192) to prevent the landing of any foreign submarine cable without authority of Congress; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on the Judiciary is the proper reference.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Iowa suggests the Judiciary Committee. I have no preference, but I thought the Committee on Commerce was the proper committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. It might go to the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Commerce, or the Committee on Foreign Relations. Either might take jurisdiction of it.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest, on reflection, that the Committee on Foreign Relations would be the most proper.

Mr. GRIMES. I am content; but it seems to me the question that is going to be presented by this resolution will be the conflict of jurisdiction between the Federal and State Governments. That is a judicial question, and it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee to settle it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken first on the first-named committee. The question is on referring the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was so referred.

DISABILITIES OF JOHN G. STOKES.

Mr. WARNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 738) to relieve from disabilities John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WARNER. I ask for a suspension of the rule, that this bill may be immediately passed; and I will state to the Senate briefly the reason for this somewhat unusual action. Mr. Stokes has been elected to the office of county solicitor, or prosecuting attorney of the county of Montgomery, Alabama. The court meets next Monday, and it will be impossible for him to enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office without this relief. If a reference of the bill is made it will probably delay it so as to be too late to meet the wants of the case. I will state that Mr. Stokes is known to me personally, living in my own town, and is also well known to my colleague, and we both can vouch unqualifiedly for his loyalty and for the propriety of relieving him. I hope that present action on the bill may be taken under the circumstances.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to amend the bill by inserting the name of a gentleman situated under similar circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill, which requires unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to remove all political disabilities imposed on John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama, by reason of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "Alabama" the words "and De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee." Mr. Senter is now a member of our Legislature, and he is supposed to labor under disabilities. He has been a thoroughly loyal man since the reorganization of the State. I hope the amendment will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. STEWART. If the bill is to be amended I shall feel compelled to move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. STEWART. One word. The Senator from Alabama explained the particular circumstances of this case, that Mr. Stokes was about to enter upon the discharge of the duties of his office almost immediately, and it being an exceedingly hard case I thought I would make no objection to it if the bill could go through in that form; but if the bill is to be loaded with amendments I shall insist on its reference. If one amendment is put on now there will be a dozen upon it before it gets through the other House. If the bill can be passed, allowing this man to enter on the discharge of his duties without amendment I have no objection, because I think it ought to pass. But if you add names to it it will be back here again in a day or two with a large number of additional names from the other House. Under the circumstances, therefore, if amendments are to be insisted upon, I think the bill had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the amendment is insisted upon the bill will not accomplish its original purpose, because it will be loaded down with a dozen names before it gets through, and will come back here for concurrence, and this man will not be relieved in time to answer his purpose. I think, therefore, it had better be considered in the usual way.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. It is, perhaps, proper to state that Mr. Senter is now president of the senate of the Legislature of Tennessee, and upon the resignation of Governor Brownlow, which must occur prior to the 4th of March, he will succeed him as Governor of the State. I think the case of Mr. Senter is quite as strong as that of Mr. Stokes, of Alabama. Under our constitution the president of the senate succeeds the Governor in case of his resignation. Governor Brownlow is my successor, and will take his seat in the Senate on the 4th of March next, and of course he must resign the governorship between this and the 4th of March, and then Mr. Senter will succeed him. I think a stronger case can be made out for Mr. Senter than for Mr. Stokes, of Alabama. Perhaps the Senator from Nevada was not aware of these facts.

Mr. STEWART. I was not aware of those facts; but still I think the bill had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee meet to-morrow; these two names can go there, and we can report immediately.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I suppose there can be no objection to inserting the name of Mr. Senter. I have stated the facts. He succeeds Governor Brownlow as Governor of the State; he is now president of the senate. Governor Brownlow will certainly resign the governorship between this and the 4th of March and Mr. Senter will succeed him as Governor of Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOWLER. Rather than interfere with the bill I will withdraw the amendment. I do not want any personal objection to me to interfere with the relieving of this citizen, who ought to be relieved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his amendment. Does the Senator from Nevada withdraw his motion?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE. I suggest, as a two-thirds vote is required to pass the bill, that the yeas and nays will have to be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is right in supposing that it requires a two-thirds vote; but a unanimous vote is certainly equivalent to that. The bill is passed.

COPIES OF PAPERS AS EVIDENCE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a bill on the table that has passed the House of Representatives, and has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which it is important should pass at an early day in order to have it take effect with reference to matters that are now pending in court. It is House bill No. 1428. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration. It will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with amendments. The amendments were, in line three to strike out the words "any and" and to insert the word "official" before "papers;" and after the word "documents" to insert the words "belonging to and;" in line six to strike out the words "any and" before the word "all," and after the word "all" to insert the word "official;" and in line nine, after the words "United States," to strike out the words "and shall have, as evidence, the same force and effect as the original papers, documents, or entries;" so that the bill will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That copies of all official papers and documents belonging to and filed or remaining in the office of any consul, vice consul, or commercial agent of the United States, and of all official entries in the books or records of any such office, shall, when certified under the hand and official seal of the proper consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, be admissible in evidence in all the courts of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to inquire of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary whether this bill would cover criminal cases? If it is intended to embrace criminal trials there may possibly be a difficulty in it. The Constitution requires that the witnesses shall confront the accused face to face.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose that it would cover any such cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1537) to repeal certain provisions of section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867;

A bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of Joseph Moorhead; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) explanatory of the act to create an additional land office in the State of Minnesota, approved July 25, 1868.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

Mr. HOWE. At the adjournment before Christmas there was a bill pending for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama. I suppose that to be the regular order for this afternoon. If it is, I should like to have the Senate proceed to its consideration. If it is not, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

Mr. HOWE. I made some remarks on this bill the other day when it was before the Senate, and intended then to explain what I omitted to explain, the relation of the Committee on Claims to this particular bill. It was reported from the committee at the last session of the Senate, but upon reflection since it was called up I am inclined to think that the present members of the Committee on Claims are not committed to this bill, but only consented that the bill should be reported to the Senate. I am not very clear in my recollection about it. It was once reported upon full consideration by a former Committee on Claims, and then it was passed by the Senate. I remember to have been urged strenuously during the last days of the last session to have this bill reported. I had not, as my recollection is now, time to consult the different members of the committee upon the merits of the bill, and I rather think I only had their consent to report the bill. That is my present recollection about it, and it is due to the members of the committee that that statement should be made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, when the Senate was about adjourning for the purpose of taking a recess I had taken the floor briefly to consider this subject. I will now ask the attention of the Senate while I submit my views in reference to it. The question is one of much importance.

I cannot avoid the belief that the allowance of this claim will open the door for enough of similar claims from the lately insurrectionary States seriously to affect the Treasury. Miss Murphey was a loyal lady. Her house was destroyed by direction of General Sherman, in order to erect a fortification. Whether the claim be a good one or not, her case cannot be distinguished from that of loyal citizens in the enemy's country whose houses were raked by artillery, whose fields were ravaged, whose granaries were emptied, whose cattle were driven off, and whose houses were occupied by our troops, so that this bill brings before the Senate the whole question of these southern claims. All this damage was done under the jus belli, to strengthen our own power in the war and to weaken that of the enemy.

It is said that her case is peculiar in that she was loyal. I answer I do not know that there were not a multitude of loyal people at the South. At all events, I have no doubt that there is a multitude that could now bring proof which we could not controvert of their loyalty; and I do not see but that a person residing at the South who was as loyal as he possibly could be under the surroundings has not as meritorious a position as one who was perfectly loyal. And hence, so far as the number of such claims is concerned, her loyalty does not distinguish her case.

Neither is the importance of this question shaken by the observation of my friend from Wisconsin, that we have hitherto had very few such claims presented. We have not yet, by the establishment of any precedent, advertised that our doors were open to claims of this character; and I would remark that if it is our purpose to establish the principle here involved when asked to do so by loyal citizens residing in the enemy's country, we must be prepared to admit the claims of the citizens of friendly Powers who had property or who were residing there, and by our so doing we may recognize a large amount of indebtedness to be set off against our Alabama claims.

The question, as I have said, is of importance because of the effect a determination that the Government is under obligations to pay would have upon our Treasury. But I would remark that the amount of these claims can be properly urged only to make us careful in our judgment, and not as a reason why we should not pay them. If they are legal and just they should be paid, no matter what is the amount. The Treasury of the nation is of less value than the nation's faith.

But, Mr. President, I submit that this is not a legal claim on the Government. The general proposition "that it is the right of one belligerent not only to coerce the other by direct force, but also to cripple his resources by seizure and destruction of his property," will not be disputed. The right of belligerents to take property in the enemy's country for fortifications and sustenance will not be disputed. And again, it is settled that "whether one is an enemy or not is to be determined, not by his or her state of feeling toward the invading power, but by his or her residence and citizenship."

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator tell me his authority for the last proposition?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will presently give the Senator references to the authorities on which I rely. The letter of Mr. Dana takes the ground that the question is not as to the state of feeling of the individual, but as to residence and citizenship. The same doctrine has been held by our Supreme Court, as I will show.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to remark, however, that it was the purpose of Mr. Dana's letter to explain not upon what the question of enmity rested, but to explain that the question of personal enmity had nothing to do with this matter; that the guilt attached to the property, not to the individual.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then the letter of Mr. Dana sustains me in the position that the liability of property to be treated as "enemy property" does not depend on the state of feeling entertained toward the Government by the owner of the property. The Supreme Court of the United States have gone further, and said in several decisions, which I shall refer to, that it is a question of residence, of citizenship, and of location of the property.

But it is insisted that the recent rebellion differs from a war between foreign nations in this, that the Government of the United States was bound to protect its loyal citizens and their property, or to indemnify them for its failure to do so. Is it so clear, I ask, that the national Government is under the obligation to protect the property of the citizens of any State? Is not the province of the Federal Government rather to preserve the integrity of the external relations of the nation, and to address itself to the duty of seeing that the States maintain their proper relations to the central Government? Have not the States the dominion over the domestic interests of the citizen? And if the obligation to indemnify for a breach of the public peace rests anywhere, is it not with the States rather than with us?

But the obligations to indemnify for the results of a breach of the peace, for a rebellion or a riot, never rests with any sovereignty, be it a monarchy, or a republic, or a State. A State, to secure greater assiduity on the part of the local municipal authorities, sometimes holds them to indemnify for the results of a breach of the peace; but no State, no sovereignty ever undertakes to indemnify for the result of a rebellion or a riot. The sovereignty assumes that it has done all its duty, executed to the fullest extent its power to preserve the peace, and that in so doing it has done all that it is bound to do; and this theory in the case we are considering has been made practical by hundreds of thousands of lives and millions of treasure expended to preserve the peace. So that if we are only dealing with the war as an insurrection or as a rebellion, there existed no obligation to indemnify.

We are, however, dealing with the recent contest as a war with all the incidents of a war, and not with an insurrection. It was the dictate of humanity to treat the conflict as a war with its incidents, and not as a rebellion with its incidents. If a rebellion merely we should have had the right and we should have been under the obligation to execute as rebels the prisoners that we took, and the enemy by captures and reprisals would have retaliated, and the war on this principle would have been cruel, indeed, and would every day have been more and more destructive. We treated the conflict as a war, and then came the exchange of prisoners, the sanctity of the truce, and the other courtesies incident to a public national war.

We are not, as the Supreme Court has substantially said, to come to the absurd conclusion that insurgents who have risen in rebellion against the sovereign, expelled the courts, established a revolutionary government, organized armies, and commenced hostilities, are not enemies because they are traitors; and that war levied on the Government by traitors, in order to dismember and destroy it, is not war, because it is an insurrection. Neither are we to hold that the contest is not war with all its incidents because it is a civil war. The highest authority settles it that the contest in which we have been engaged was a civil war, and that the property within the enemy's country was "enemy property;" and so far from there being any obligation to indemnify for its incidental destruction the nation had a perfect right to make its destruction, even when belonging to loyal citizens, a means of weakening the enemy.

Vattel says, page 293, margin:

"Civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect: it produces in the nation two independent parties who can consider each other as enemies and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties therefore must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Having no common superior to judge between them they stand in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest and have recourse to arms."

The Supreme Court, in the prize cases, 2 Black, 674, say:

"All persons residing within this territory, whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power, are in this contest liable to be treated as enemies, though they are not foreigners."

Further:

"The products of the soil of the hostile territory, as the source of its wealth and strength, are always regarded as legitimate prize without regard to the domicile of the owner, and much more so if he reside within their territory."

In the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton, 2 Wallace, 419, the Chief Justice says, delivering the opinion of the court:

"It is said, that though remaining in rebel territory Mrs. Alexander had no personal sympathy with the rebel cause, and that her property therefore cannot be regarded as rebel property; but this court cannot inquire into the personal character and disposition of individual inhabitants of enemy territory; we must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the Legislature and the Executive, or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed."

As it is clear that there is no legal obligation to indemnify for the destruction or use of property in the rebel territory, so it is clear that such claim is not founded in justice. It is a misconception to hold that the property of loyal citizens in enemy territory when taken for war purposes, is taken under the governmental right of "eminent domain" and to be compensated for. It is a principle of the common law too familiar to be questioned, that in emergency, as to prevent pestilence, shipwreck, loss of life, starvation, or in case of public calamity, private property may be taken and destroyed without the party destroying it being liable in damages. All men hold their property subject to this rule, and as an equivalent have the benefit of the rule. (12 Coke, 62; 1 Dallas, 357.) The maxim is, Necessitas quod cogit defendit. What necessity compels necessity defends. If a canker is eating at the finger and sending its virus through the body, you may cut off the finger or arm so as to save the body and the finger cannot complain, for it would have died with the body. I do not deny that this property of Miss Murphey was, on the principles adopted by the commission, worth $7,000, but I do insist that on true and correct principles it was worth nothing. If this Government had not exerted its power and put down the rebellion the confederacy would have been established. The claimant is to be assumed to have been a loyal woman; such is her claim. She is to be assumed to have been the enemy of the confederacy; she was our friend. It is only on that assumption that she has any standing here; and by the law of nations as well as by the then existing statutes of the confederacy her property would, on the success of the rebellion, have been confiscated by the confederate government. This was done in many States after the Revolution before the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Her property was worth nothing to her if the United States had not successfully interfered.

And what justice is there in calling on this Government to pay for the destruction or use of that which if they had not used or destroyed would have been valueless?

It is said again, if we refuse to recognize the claims of the loyal we make no discrimination in favor of loyalty, and that there is no profit in possessing that virtue. A pestilence when it enters a town does not discriminate in favor of loyalty or of any other virtue, and this Government is as irresponsible for the rebellion as for the pestilence.

Again, I insist that the Government of the United States is not the responsible cause of taking Miss Murphey's property. The instigators of the rebellion by making war on us took her property. General Sherman went down there to protect that country, to protect her and her property, and he put his foot upon her house and destroyed it. He is not the responsible cause of the destruction of her property. One might as well hold the brave men who come to extinguish the fire and save your house and family from destruction responsible for the damage the saving stream does to your household goods. It is the fire, not the water; it is the incendiary, not the fireman, that causes the damage. This Government is not the responsible cause of the destruction of any property in the enemy's territory.

If we are to begin to pay for the results of the rebellion why shall we not as well pay those who suffered within our own lines? Why should not the merchant whose shipping has been destroyed be paid? Why not pay the estate of Thaddeus Stevens for his loss? Yes; and as life is more favored in the law than property, why not pay the widows and orphans of the North the pecuniary value of the lives of their husbands and fathers?

As to the plea that the Government was bound to protect the loyal citizens, I will only add to what I have said that this nation did all it could to protect the property, and it never entered into any contract with any citizen to do more than that. If there is no neglect there is no claim growing out of neglect. But besides, the injury complained of results from the very act of affording that protection which it is insisted we were bound to render, and affording it successfully, too.

It is insisted, and was urged by my friend from Wisconsin, that the Government in making provision for payment for cotton of loyal citizens seized in the enemy's country has established a precedent that covers this claim. That I must deny. It was wise legislation that authorized the seizure of cotton wherever found, inasmuch as cotton constituted the chief means by which the rebels were furnished with the munitions of war. It was wise to remove it, and it was wise to remove the cotton of loyal citizens, for that was subject to be seized by the rebel government, and it was impossible for us to discriminate that which was the property of the loyal from that which was the property of the disloyal. It was wise for the United States to seize and sell it and then pay the net proceeds to loyal owners, because it kept the cotton out of rebel hands, and because it cost the Treasury of the United States nothing. Does the paying of damages incident to the war, such as this case, cost the Treasury of the United States nothing? If that be true I will vote for the payment of the claim. Who cannot see the broadest distinction between these two cases? When I as a trustee receive a fund for the benefit of my cestui que trust, and pay it out to him, the receiving of it does not increase, and the payment of it does not diminish my estate; but when I am called on as a wrongdoer to pay the value of property that is destroyed, that directly affects my interest.

Paying the net proceeds of cotton to loyal owners has not cost the nation anything; it has only paid what it received. The establishment of the principle involved in this claim might exhaust the Treasury. There is a difference in the two cases, I think.

The only precedent on this subject that I know of is, that by a vote of Congress the Court of Claims were forbidden from taking jurisdiction of any claim whatever arising in the rebel territory. If the Government desire to pay any claim of this character it can only do so as a matter of generosity. I insist that it should not do so on the ground that the claim is either legal or founded on justice. There may be cases that appeal to the generosity of the Government, but when we come to act on that principle we should remember that we are the trustees, guardians of the nation's Treasury, and should not forget that even such an exercise of governmental favor might easily be perverted into a precedent to prove that the United States had acknowledged its obligation in law and in justice to pay for the injurious results of the war to those who claim to have been loyal in the enemy's territory.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Claims it is perhaps becoming in me to say a few words on this subject. The ground upon which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, if I understand him correctly, places this claim is that it is the duty of the Government to protect all loyal citizens.

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, the Senator did not understand me correctly if that is the way he understood me.

Mr. HOWARD. I certainly so understood the honorable Senator.

Mr. HOWE. By no manner of means.

Mr. HOWARD. I certainly understood that from the remarks which the honorable Senator made a few days ago when this bill was under discussion, but I probably misunderstood him. However, I apprehend that whatever may be the ground upon which he chooses to place it, that in the end will be discovered to be the only plausible ground upon which it can be rested.

Now, sir, I entirely deny the proposition that in time of war or at any time it is one of the duties of the government of a nation or the government of a State to indemnify citizens for the losses which may have occurred in the course of a war offensive or defensive, or in the event of a riot or any public disturbance which endangers the peace of the community or the property of the community.

The honorable Senator must be aware that the Committee on Claims have already passed on quite a number of claims involving the same principles upon which this must rest. That committee had before them the claim of the New York and Virginia Steamship Company, and for the information of the Senate I beg leave to read a few passages from the report of the committee on that case. The committee say:

"The petitioners claim compensation for the destruction and loss of the Yorktown and the Jamestown, two steamships belonging to them, and employed in the year 1861 and previously in the business of navigation between New York and Richmond, and in transporting the United States mail between those two ports under a contract with the Government. They allege that on their regular trips from New York to Richmond the Yorktown was seized on the 17th of April, and the Jamestown on the 18th of April, 1861, the former at Richmond and the latter at City Point; that these seizures were made by the Governor of Virginia, and that the two steamships were converted into gunboats by the rebel authorities, used in the rebel service, and finally blown up and destroyed on the capture of Richmond; that soon after these seizures certain persons representing the authorities of Virginia proposed to pay the company the value of the two steamers, with damages for their detention, but that on consulting with the secretary of the State the company were informed that such a settlement would be illegal and treasonable, for the reason that it would be converting the seizure into a formal sale of the property to the enemy."

That, perhaps, is a sufficient statement of the facts of the case. There is no doubt about the fact that the rebels in Virginia seized those two valuable steamers, converted them in the first place to the use of the government of Virginia, then in rebellion against the United States, and afterwards turned them over to the Confederate States of America, by which government they were used during the pendency of the war until the final capture of Richmond, at which time they were blown up by the enemy and utterly destroyed. This company was a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York. The steamers were the property, not of enemies, but of friends residing in the loyal portion of the United States. Their property was found at the commencement of hostilities within the limits of the hostile territory; it was there seized by the public enemy, converted to his use, and ultimately destroyed. The Committee on Claims of this body, in investigating the question and reporting to the Senate upon it, used the following language:

"The question whether the Government ought to indemnify persons residing in and citizens of the loyal States for damages done to their property by the rebels or under rebel authority during the war, is one which embraces the principle on which the present claim appears to be founded. The committee do not recognize such an obligation. Cases may, it is true, arise in which it would be proper and just for the Government to come to the relief of innocent sufferers, but they must, we think, embrace some peculiar fact or element giving them an exceptional aspect. War is a great calamity, making little discrimination between the good and the bad, the well-doer and the ill-doer, the innocent and the guilty. It is a scourge from which few in the nation escape, and its blows fall with pitiless severity upon all.

"Municipal laws are the instruments by which Governments ordinarily protect their subjects against wrongs done to them by others, and a faithful administration of them is ordinarily the measure of protection which can be demanded of a Government. But war usually interrupts their administration to a greater or less extent; and no Government on earth, however prudent and however powerful, can avert the calamities it brings upon individuals. One nation may, if it sees fit, make a sudden and unannounced invasion of another, and seize and carry off private property as the spoils of war, or seize and detain the persons of its owners. History abounds with such instances; but we do not understand it to be a duty of the insulted Government to make good the damage done in all such cases. Our own history proves the contrary; and the numerous claims for indemnity to our citizens for wrongs done them under the authority of other Governments, without having first made good the damage, constitute a long chapter in our diplomacy."

The committee, in this report, as well as in other reports which have been made to this body, have substantially, and I insist sufficiently, rejected the idea that the Government of this country is liable to indemnify loyal persons residing in the South for the destruction of their property during the war, whether that destruction was produced by the acts of the enemy or by the necessary acts of our own military forces in prosecuting the war to put down the rebellion.

Sir, it is not the function of a Government to indemnify its citizens against losses of property in this way. It is not a principle of public law that any such obligation rests upon a Government. There may be some exceptions to the general rule; but the duty of the Government is ordinarily, generally speaking, to furnish the usual and necessary means for the protection of life, liberty, and property, by the proper administration of its laws in courts of justice, and having furnished such instrumentalities it has discharged its duty to the citizen. The war through which we have passed was, as has been very justly remarked by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, a civil war. It was a war to which there were distinct parties belligerent. In its prosecution, on both sides, it was attended by the enforcement of all the ordinary rules and usages of war pertaining to the code of war when waged between independent nations. Humanity required that both parties should recognize those usages. Hence we find that blockades were established, exchanges of prisoners were established, and indeed all the incidents growing out of a state of national war were recognized by our own courts. The territory of the belligerent States was to all intents and purposes, as has been more than once recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, enemy's territory, and all persons residing within the limits of that territory, and all property situated there, have been regarded by our courts of justice as, in the sense of the laws of war, enemies and enemy property.

Now, sir, I deny that by the principles of public law or any law it is incumbent upon the Government of the United States to indemnify a loyal person residing in the insurgent States for the loss of property taken by the Union armies in the regular prosecution of the war. You might as well say, in my judgment—and you must say if you recognize such a principle—that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to indemnify and pay every ship owner whose vessel was captured upon the high seas or elsewhere by the pirates that roamed the ocean and who emigrated from England or any other foreign country. It will be, if we recognize this claim, Mr. President, it seems to me—I do not see how we are to avoid it—incumbent upon us to pay off every cent of the claims which we now make against England for the destruction of our shipping by their Alabamas. How are we to avoid it, sir? Where is the distinction between the two cases? Here we are called upon to indemnify this lady whose house was destroyed, it seems, by General Sherman in the regular prosecution of the war. Why are we called upon to do this? Because, it is said, that we owed to her the duty of protection; that she being a loyal woman was to be protected in the enjoyment of her property, and if that was taken from her, either by our own troops or by the enemy—for there is no distinction between the two cases—then she is to be indemnified. And so will the owners of the ships that have been destroyed by the Alabamas present their claim; they will say to us that we owed them protection in the same sense and upon exactly the same principle that we owed it to this lady.

Sir, we are under no such obligation; the Government itself is under no such duty, and there is no principle of public law that I can discover that would authorize us to tax the people of the United States for the payment of such claims. We did our duty when we organized regular governments in the South and kept them up there. It was a misfortune both to the people of the South and the people of the North that this war broke out; but it did break out, and it raged like a flame upon the prairie, destroying everything within its reach; and I insist that this controversy is to be treated as a war, and that no person is to claim indemnity at our hands simply upon the ground that at heart he was a loyal person residing in the southern States. Suppose he should be loyal to-day and to-morrow he should become in his heart disloyal, what are you to do in such a case as that? And these cases, of course, must be very numerous. Sir, we can take cognizance of no such feeling of the heart among the people at the South during the war; we must adopt the language of the Supreme Court which has just been read, and say that it is not competent for us to make any inquiry into the feelings of the claimant whether he is loyal or disloyal. We can only take cognizance of the fact that he resided or that his property was situated in the hostile territory, and if either the one or the other was there it was subject, by the laws of war, to be seized or to be destroyed as the exigencies of the war might require.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish, if I can, to make the Senate understand—certainly I shall be able to make my friend from New Jersey and my friend from Michigan understand—that I do not defend this claim for a moment upon any such pretense as that the Government is bound to indemnify its friends in any section of the country against damages sustained through the act or action of its enemies. Not at all; I impose no such duty upon the sovereignty. Whatever loss Miss Murphey or anybody, my friend from New Jersey even included, has sustained by the action of our enemies, this Government is not bound to pay for. What I do insist upon is, that because the neighbors of Miss Murphey or the neighbors of the Senator from New Jersey happen to turn traitors at any time, that gives no license to the Government of the United States, whose loyal friend the Senator from New Jersey is, and whose loyal friend Miss Murphey was, to plunder him or her.

Miss Murphey asks this Government to pay for property which this Government has taken and used, and the Senator from Michigan reads here as authority against it the decision of the Committee on Claims refusing to pay for two steamboats which the rebel government took and converted to their use, confounding the conversion of property by the rebel government with the conversion and use of property by the Government of the United States. It seems to me that the distinction is as broad as distinctions can possibly be. I do not insist upon the duty or obligation of indemnity; I simply say that the Government should pay for this property because they took it, and took it from a loyal person; and I do not care where that person resided, within or without the district occupied by the rebellion, I say, in justice the Government is bound to pay for it. But in point of fact Miss Murphey did not reside within the district occupied by the rebellion any more than the Senator from New Jersey did, or any more than I did. She was living at Decatur; it was in Alabama, to be sure; but that portion of Alabama was under the flag of the United States, and Decatur was occupied by the troops of the United States, and the rebellion had no more force or authority over Decatur than it had over Newark or over Detroit.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will ask my friend whether his attention has been called to the view the Supreme Court took of the point he is now upon, in the case of Mrs. Alexander? Her cotton was also within our lines; but the Supreme Court said in that case that although temporarily it was within our lines, the territory had not acquired that character, by means of legislative action or otherwise, which took it out of the rules which applied to enemy territory. There the great river where the cotton was taken had been, I think, three weeks in our possession under Banks's expedition, but it afterward went back to the enemy.

Mr. HOWE. My attention has been called to that precise point, and I cited the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton the other day as authority upon that point, and I called the attention of the Senate then, as I call the attention of the Senate now once more, to the distinctive ground upon which this whole doctrine rests. The Senator was right when he said that the question of the personal feeling of the owner of the property had nothing to do with the question of the liability to pay; but it was the predicament of the property, it was the question whether the property was liable to serve the purposes of the enemy or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we must pay rebels as well as loyal people if their property comes under the same conditions.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the motive, if the state of feeling of the particular person who owns the property has nothing to do with the question, then a rebel whose property was taken under the same circumstances in Decatur has the same right to compensation that Sue Murphey has.

Mr. HOWE. I say the question whether the person is friendly or hostile has nothing to do with the question of our liability; it is the question, what is the predicament of the property, what is the position of the property, what is the situation of the property? If the property is so situated that it is liable and likely to be made to serve the purposes of the enemy, then the Government is not liable to pay, let it be owned by a friendly or hostile individual.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, I ask my honorable friend if the result is not that the question of the loyalty or disloyalty of the owner of property that is taken has nothing whatever to do with the question whether we ought to pay for it? That is the proposition my friend asserts, as I understand him. Then the result would be, on his line of reasoning, that if there was a rebel owner of property in Decatur who until our flag stood there had been resisting it with all his might, the moment we came in and occupied his property after the enemy had been driven away then we should be bound to make him compensation just as well, because the rule is that it is the status of the property, not of the owner, that is to govern the duty of compensation. I do not agree to it at all.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, I do not think that it is a fair comment upon the statement I made. When you take the property of a rebel you take it under a right to confiscate it, or you take it and exclude him from all your tribunals upon the ground of his personal enmity. That is the way you get rid of paying him; but you cannot exclude your friend from your tribunals; he has a right to come here, a right to be heard here, and a right to be heard in your courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the question whether he is friendly makes some difference, does it not?

Mr. HOWE. Not to the principle I am discussing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does with the result.

Mr. HOWE. Not with the result in this case. There is, Mr. President, a great variety of cases in the books; several of them I have seen; and it is impossible for me to consider them all in discussing this case of Miss Sue Murphey. I say once more that the courts have taken particular pains to say that the question of liability is not controlled by the personal disposition of the claimant, but it is to be controlled by the attitude and predicament of the property; and therefore it was claimed in the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton that that did not come within the rule of enemy's property, or enemy property, which is the better form of expression, because that territory at the time the cotton was taken was in the possession of our troops. But, said the court, although our troops were there temporarily at the time the cotton was taken yet the result showed that they had not that permanent occupation of the country which took the property from that predicament in which it was liable to serve the purposes of the enemy. Our troops were there, but they could not stay there. They were driven out; and if the cotton had been left there it would have been left there to contribute to the uses of the enemy in war. So the courts said that that temporary occupation did not relieve the property from the operation of the rule.

But it was no temporary occupation of Decatur. Our troops were there when this property was taken possession of, and they had been there until this time, or at least our flag and our authority had been there; and standing upon the history of events since this property was taken by our troops we are authorized and we are bound to say that there was no more guilt in the predicament of this property than there was in the property owned by my friend in the State of New Jersey. If our armies had been driven from New Jersey the property of my friend would have been as liable to contribute to the uses of the enemy as was the property of Miss Murphey. Hers could only relieve the enemy in case they drove back our troops, and they did not drive back our troops. If they had driven back our troops out of New Jersey then the property of the Senator would have been in the same condition that hers was.

Mr. President, there is a case illustrating this principle which I am trying to enforce. When war was declared between Russia and Turkey in 1854 a ship from Wallachia, one of the Turkish provinces, undertook to run out of the Danube, and was captured by a British war vessel at the mouth of the Danube. She was running the blockade, the mouth of the Danube being under blockade at the time. Moldavia and Wallachia were occupied by Russian troops; Great Britain was at war with Russia; and it was claimed that this vessel coming from a province occupied by the armies of the enemy, the armies of Russia, was enemy property, and was liable to forfeiture. But the British courts held that it was not; that the occupation of the Russian forces was temporary, and was so explained that it was not for the purpose of permanent conquest, it was a mere temporary occupation; and therefore that this property was not liable to contribute to the strength of Russia, and so there was no occasion to apply this principle.

So when Great Britain was at war with France, and France owned the island of San Domingo, a negro insurrection broke out in San Domingo against the French Government, and the negroes got possession of a large portion of the island; Great Britain at once fraternized with them as with the enemies of France. Still the British courts held that this temporary occupation by the negro authorities there of a portion of the island did not prevent the whole island from being still enemy's property, because it was a temporary occupation, was not permanent, was not accompanied by any recognized and legal right.

Here, Mr. President, was a hostile force at one time, long before this property was taken, occupying this one district belonging to our jurisdiction; that hostile force was removed, our own authority was reinstated there, our troops took possession; and after they took possession, and after our authority was fully and permanently restored, (for our right over the place we never conceded was subjected to any doubt in the world,) after our occupation was complete again, this property was taken possession of by our Government and for its use. Now I ask, in the name of common sense, putting all the authorities that ever were written and published into the fire or under your foot; I ask in the name of plain, honest common sense, what right or pretense of right this Government had for taking the property of Miss Murphey at that time, in that place, for its use, that it had not for taking my property or the property of the Senator from Vermont?

If you say that the Senator from Vermont was loyal the case says that Miss Murphey was loyal. If you say that the Senator from Vermont resided within a loyal State, I say that there is not a book in the world that makes that a circumstance in determining this thing. If you say that the Senator from Vermont resided within the jurisdiction and the authority of the United States, I say that Miss Murphey resided just there and nowhere else in the world, as completely under the jurisdiction and authority of the United States as did the Senator from Vermont or anybody else.

Mr. President, beyond all question it is an extreme right recognized in the laws of war for one belligerent Power to take the private property of its enemies in a hostile country, and to that extent, irrespective of the personal dispositions of the different residents in that country, to treat them all as enemies in that one respect; but it is an extreme right of war. There is not a civilized nation on the face of God's earth that dares prosecute war to-day upon that principle thus broadly stated in the books. When General Scott led your armies from Vera Cruz to Mexico he was in a country every citizen of which was supposed to be hostile to us and every citizen of which was bound to be hostile to us; but although General Scott was obliged on that march to supply his forces from the enemy and from that enemy's country, yet his orders were express to pay for every pound and every bushel that was taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was a matter of policy.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, as justice always is: and this I think is a matter of policy for the same reason. I think we should be as cautious against asserting the right of this Government to take the property of our friends, even in rebel districts, as General Scott was against asserting the right to take the property of Mexicans when he was marching through their territory. What was the policy in that? Why, this: that if he asserted the right to take property without compensation the Mexicans would struggle a little harder to prevent his progress toward Mexico, and might destroy the property. You assert the doctrine to-day that when a portion of the people take up arms against the authority of this Government you have a right and are bound to treat all the people within that neighborhood, within that district, within that State—call it by what name you please—as your enemies; and how many friends do you think you will find in any State when the standard of rebellion has once been raised again? You advertise and put it upon your statutes that whenever a State shall raise the flag of secession hereafter it is the bounden interest, the first and highest interest of every one of those citizens to put himself into the ranks of your enemies and to fight your armies step by step. Why? Because it is only by defeating their own Government that they have any protection for themselves. They must whip you or they must suffer. That is the doctrine you are invited to put upon your statute-book.

Mr. President, I insist upon it that the adjudications of our courts are not open to the reproach of sanctioning any such doctrine as this; and I am bound to say, in justice to my own sense of right and wrong, that if all the courts that have ever been commissioned from the foundation of the Government down to this time had sanctioned such a principle as that, I would, to the extent of my power, stand here and resist it as monstrous.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry of him for information?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I do it that I may understand how far he ignores as an element in the case the existence of war, such as it was. Suppose this woman, living where she did, situated as she was, by reason of her conspicuous loyalty had become a mark for the enemy, and the case showed that they destroyed her property, their motive and the moving cause being that she was conspicuously a friend of the General Government; does the Senator think that that case or this, upon its equity and its legal merits, would be the strongest? In other words, if we pay this claim, could we refuse to pay if the case was so far changed as I suggest? I admit this question is somewhat foreign; but I put it as a test to see what part, in the estimation of the Senator, is played by the fact that a war did exist, and how thoroughly he puts this claim upon the ground that the Government having taken private property for public use compensation is to be made.

Mr. HOWE. I will answer the Senator's question as candidly as I can. I must say to him in all frankness that in the view I take of the matter I can see no possible relationship between the case that he suggests and the case that I am presenting to the Senate. I can see no more connection between the two than I could see between a proposition that the Senator from Vermont should pay his own note and another one that he should pay mine because he is held bound to pay his own note. I ask that the Government shall pay for this property because this Government took it for its own use; and the Senator asks me, as I understand him, if I mean to carry that principle so far as to say that this Government should pay for it if the rebels had destroyed it.

Mr. CONKLING. No; I mean to ask whether the Senator carries it so far as to render entirely invisible the fact that a war existed, and to put it on all-fours with the case of private property taken by the Government for public use in time of peace; whether he means to leave it simply there.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President, I mean to put it on all-fours with the case now suggested, upon the precise condition that no war existed in the world; and why? Because I say that the obligation to pay for property which this Government takes for its use is an obligation as sacred in time of war as in time of peace; and no matter with whom the war is waged, it is not waged with the parties from whom you take it. If it be not so, then I say your armies were just as much at liberty to forage in New York as in Decatur; you are no more bound to pay for commissary and quartermaster stores in that city than in this town. So far as this question is concerned, I lay out of view entirely the fact that war existed.

I must say one thing more before I sit down. We have contracted a pretty considerable debt in the course of this war. A good deal of it is evidenced by bonds executed in accordance with law, and which are express promises to pay certain sums of money. The Senator from New Jersey and other Senators about me agree with me in thinking that those bonds ought to be paid, that those obligations ought to be recognized, ought to be sacredly preserved. Why? Every one of those bonds has been issued simply because the Government has got property of its friends to use in the prosecution of this war, because the Government has taken property from some of its friends just as it did the property from Miss Murphey. Why should we pay one of those bonds? Because the promise is expressed and put on paper; is that the reason? Certainly that is not the reason the Senator from New Jersey would urge. The Senator from New Jersey knows very well, as we all know, that the courts never enforce a promise simply because the promise itself is made. If there is no consideration upon which the promise is made, the promise is of no value whatever; but if there is a consideration no court cares whether the promise is expressed or not, because the promise is implied, and the courts will say that the law implies the promise from the fact that the consideration has passed. There is no promise in the case of Miss Murphey; but her property is gone; the Government has got the consideration, and the courts would imply a promise to pay for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If they took it without agreement with her, by the strong hand?

Mr. HOWE. No; I suppose in the case of an individual the court would not imply a promise to pay for it; and yet I am not so clear about that. There are a great many cases in which the courts will allow the party to waive the tort and to sue upon an implied promise; and no doubt the court, in such a case as this, would allow the party to waive the tort and to sue upon the implied promise, the promise implied by the fact that a consideration had passed.

Mr. President, I do not know but that I ought to apologize for occupying the time of the Senate so much as I have done. I am in earnest about the principle. I care nothing about this case in particular, but I want to see the question settled right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin had asked my consent to report this bill, such is my respect for him that I should have undoubtedly given it; but I have no recollection of such a fact, nor of the bill. The bill comes here, so far as I am concerned, as a surprise; for I had supposed that the Committee on Claims were thoroughly committed against the principles upon which this bill is based. If not, if the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin be correct, then wherever General Sherman, upon his march passed across the field of a loyal man and took possession of any property, the Government is bound to pay for it; for that, as I understand, is the sole ground upon which the Senator presses this claim: that it is the claim of a loyal person, and that the property was taken for public use.

Now, Mr. President, I had supposed that the Committee on Claims had laid it down, clearly and distinctly by an almost unanimous vote of the committee, that parties residing in States in rebellion were to be considered as rebels and their claims treated as such. Certainly I had the honor myself to make one or two such reports, and I will take the liberty to read from them. One was the claim of the Sisters of Charity in Charleston, South Carolina, where our fleets had bombarded and destroyed an institution erected for the purposes of charity only. They claimed compensation. The report which was adopted by the committee, and so far as I know without any dissent, reads, after reciting the facts, as follows:

"The committee, however, are compelled to examine the petition in a different attitude, and to decide whether the United States can be properly held to make reparation for all damages sustained under similar circumstances. They reluctantly conclude that the petition comes within a class of cases where justice to the nation must deny relief. A just rule must now and for all time make a discrimination between those who unfortunately suffered within the boundaries of the rebellious States and those within the Union lines.

"The destruction of the building we are now asked to restore was one of the misfortunes of the war. The siege of Charleston was desperately resisted, and its capture was most expensive in time, treasure, and blood of Union men. The orphan asylum was within the enemy's lines, and could not be separated from the enemy's property. Any rule that would bind the United States to replace this building would include all charitable and religious edifices so destroyed. The loss was a casualty that good men everywhere may lament, but the Government cannot acknowledge any responsibility therefor."

Now, Mr. President, so far as the loyalty or the non-belligerent character of parties is concerned, that case is decisive that they must follow the status, the condition of the people where they reside.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to make a word of explanation here?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. In his opening the Senator conveyed the intimation that this report, which I had explained, was made rather upon my own responsibility, though I had said with the assent of the members of the committee, was not only made without the approval of the committee, but was made in defiance of the recognized doctrine of the committee. I wish to call the Senator's attention to a fact which I guess he will remember—other members of the committee will—that this identical question has been discussed in the committee, composed as it was during the last session, I think in two cases: once when the report from which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Howard] read some extracts was before the committee. There was a clause in that report when first presented to the committee which asserted the very doctrine that is contended for here, and it was struck out by the vote of the committee; and I think a similar amendment was made to a report that was once drawn up in the case of somebody whose name I do not recollect, but who claimed pay for sugar that was destroyed in Vicksburg at the time that place was captured, where the distinct question was presented on a motion to strike out, and the motion was approved by the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was not finding fault with the Senator in relation to the bill. I was only, so far as I am concerned, professing ignorance of the bill in all its parts. But, Mr. President, so far as any discussion of the principle is involved, I think the chairman of the committee will not contend that it has ever been assented to by a majority of that committee. It has always been voted down whenever the question has come up, and by a very decisive majority, so far as I recollect.

Mr. President, I propose to read for a moment an extract from another report, which I think was adopted, and so far as I remember without dissent from any member of the committee. This is the case of the claim of Dennis Sullivan, who had accumulated a large amount of cotton in Louisiana, which our troops took possession of and destroyed. They did not use it, but they burnt it up, and burnt up some of his buildings. The only difference between the two is that in the one case the buildings were destroyed by fire, and in the case of Miss Murphey they were taken down by hand, as I suppose. The report reads as follows:

"But granting that the commanding officer was willing, as he undoubtedly was, to afford the petitioner all the protection in his power, he could not save him from the vicissitudes of war, nor even from the lawless acts of soldiers, without orders or in disobedience of orders. It was a calamity not only to the petitioner but to the nation that the Union forces were unable to hold possession of Louisiana after they had marched into it; and if, by accident or design—and there is no proof whatever on this point—the military forces set fire to and destroyed the town of Alexandria, including valuable property belonging to this petitioner, it is a matter of deep regret, but it would be contrary to all the rules of civilized nations, when thus fighting to put down an unprovoked rebellion, to pay for the damages inflicted in the enemy's country even to parties admitted to be non-belligerent.

"The character of individuals is derived not only from their own acts but from those of the Government de facto ruling and controlling for the time being. The people of Louisiana were not only disloyal, but a superior army confronted the Union forces, and the latter may have exercised the usual rights of war by destroying such property as they supposed would strengthen the enemy if it should fall into their hands."

"This being one of a large class of cases, it has been treated at considerable length; and notwithstanding it throws upon a worthy and enterprising citizen the entire burden of his personal losses resulting from the rebellion, and the legitimate efforts of the United States to conquer it, your committee are unable to perceive how this burden can with any propriety be thrown upon the Treasury of the United States. It may not be a good reason for reaching this conclusion that a precedent allowing claims of this character would most discouragingly expand the national debt, but it is satisfactory to be able to arrive at it upon the principles of justice and national law."

I think that the chairman of the committee assented to this report. I so understood at the time. I do not see why it does not cover the case of Miss Sue Murphey. Certainly, I am very sure that if this case shall pass into a precedent our present public debt will expand much beyond the proportions intimated by the Senator before the last adjournment; and so far as it rests on the precedent of the Armes case or the Segar case I consider that those precedents ought to be trampled under our feet.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] with that candor which he always displays and with that logic of which he is always master, says that for the purpose of reaching his conclusion he ignores altogether as an element in the case the existence of war or rebellion. That is an easy process, it seems to me, of disposing of this case; easy because it reaches a conclusion which, conceding the premises, no intelligent man can deny. If this be a simple instance in which a citizen has been deprived of property to the end that it might be applied or devoted to the public use and he has received no compensation, his rights are clear. But I have a great many difficulties in reaching those premises, all of which I will not stop to state, but one or two of which I venture to suggest to the honorable Senator.

I submit, in the first place, that if you ignore the fact of the war, Miss Murphey was never deprived of her property for any public use. Why? Because in that view General Sherman was a naked wrongdoer; never was there one who stood more in his own wrong. What right had he to apply the torch to Miss Murphey's house—to blow it up, if he had done that—to desolate her property? None whatever, any more than you, Mr. President, or I.

Mr. HOWE. It will perhaps be satisfactory to the Senator if I remind him of the fact that General Sherman did not blow up the house, but the fact is that he took the land on which she lived to put a fort upon it, and used the materials of the house in building the fort. I think the Senator will admit that the Government can do that in time of war or in time of peace. Its right to build forts is just as complete in time of peace as in time of war.

Mr. CONKLING. I was giving the Senator the benefit of the inaccuracy of my statement, because I was making a supposed case stronger against myself. I say, taking the case of General Sherman having gone and put a keg of powder under Miss Murphey's house and scattered it in a thousand fragments, that case would be better than this. But now I will take it as the Senator likes me to take it, precisely as it is. General Sherman occupied the premises of Miss Murphey and he incorporated her building materials into a fort. That is the case as the Senator now states it. Now, I ask the Senator if there was not a war, if General Sherman had not occupied the relation which he there occupied solely by reason of the existence of a war and his commission to carry it on, whether he would not have been a naked tort-feasor? Certainly he would. How was this property taken for public use? If with the law behind him in time of peace he had been the person to execute the orders of the Government to make a fort there, of course a very different case would exist; but he was acting, do not let us forget, solely upon his discretion in this particular act. No law said that he should occupy Miss Murphey's premises; nobody had said so. He alone adjudicated there and then that it was useful in the prosecution of the war that this occupation should take place.

Thus I say you cannot wink so hard as not to see that the war stands in the forefront of this case as one of its elements. Why, sir, as well, I submit, might the Senator refer to another thing which is found in the same Constitution; nay, in the same juxtaposition, not divided by a line, as the language he refers to: "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

You might just as well say that this provision of the Constitution, the whole of which I have now read, covers this case, and that it was utterly illegal for General Sherman to possess himself of this property at all. Why? Because Miss Murphey was being deprived of life, liberty, or property—property in this case—without due process of law. Now, Mr. President, have we not all said times too numerous to make it necessary to say it in this case that in the midst of arms laws like this were silent? Have we not said in our votes, and have we not said in our declarations a thousand times—notwithstanding the ponderous shake of the head which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin now gives to the Senate—have we not said, I repeat, in a thousand instances that during the existence of the rebellion under which the continent quaked it was not true legally or ethically that either of the provisions of the Constitution which I have read were operating, and that you could not fire a man's house or shoot at him if he stood with arms in his hands unless you did it by due process of law? Are we not all of us estopped from arguing that it ever was necessary to swear out a peace warrant against this rebellion, or sue it by summons and complaint?

Now, sir, for other reasons which I might give, I cannot divest this case for the purpose of determining my vote from the fact that this woman's property was occupied by a military leader conducting a great war in the very midst of the existence of that war.

Then, upon what principle are we to pay this claim? Are we to say, as some Senators understand the Supreme Court has said, without qualification, that this was a public war dividing two belligerents? I use the term "belligerents" in the sense of the public law. Are we to take that theory and pay this claim? Upon what principle? If, being within our lines, the Government of the United States occupied the property of Miss Murphy as a barracks, as a magazine, as an emporium of some sort, and thereby subjected it to an attack from which otherwise it would have been exempt, and the enemy destroyed it, we can all find a principle of public law upon which she may be paid. It was that principle strained to a great length, under the advocacy of a very dexterous and able man from my own State, which was made to cover the case of the village of Black Rock, burned on the frontier of New York during the war of 1812. It was rather difficult, and required, as I say, great ingenuity to bring the facts up to the requirement of the law, but Congress virtually determined there that that village was destroyed owing to its selection and occupation for the military purposes of the United States, in consequence of which a fire was drawn upon it which otherwise it would have escaped. That will not do here. I mention it partly because the Senator thought the question I put to him a very remote one.

Now, I submit to him that if it is to be treated upon principles of public law this woman's case would be far stronger if the enemy had destroyed her property. If, by reason of occupation by the United States, the enemy had been led to destroy her property manifestly the case would have been stronger.

But I submit that in ethics and in principle her case would be stronger if owing to nothing but her loyalty, nothing but the fact that she was singled out as an adherent of the Government, she had been visited by the enemy with destruction, because there would be a distinction somewhat minute, somewhat technical, between her case and plenty of cases in which compensation has been given. But that will not do. She was, the Senator says, for this purpose within the lines of the United States, and she was blotted out by the United States.

How? Because her property was taken for public use under circumstances, and in a sense making operative the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred. I say, and I think the two Houses of Congress have said over and over again, in effect, that her property was destroyed in the conduct and progress of the war just as my house may be blown up, although it is not on fire, if it stands next to the house of my friend and other houses which are in danger unless it is blown up, to the end that the connection by which the flame creeps from house to house may be broken. A necessity like that overtook this woman, and she went down, as the honorable Senator from New Jersey, I think, well said, awaiting destruction from the other side, which would have been inevitable had not this march and this progress of our armies taken place.

Now, if this was a public war is there any principle upon which she can recover? On the contrary is it not well settled that as the tree fell so it must lie; that it was her fate and her misfortune that not she but her country was scourged by this great public calamity?

What other principle is there? A principle of protection, that the Government of the United States, speaking within the States, was bound, if I appreciate the argument, to guarantee public order and the preservation of property to every citizen in the State.

Mr. HOWE. Whose argument was that?

Mr. CONKLING. Not yours. The argument was suggested by the Senator from New Jersey as a possible argument that might be made in favor of this claim; the argument embraced in his suggestion that upon some theory of generosity or equity it might be paid. I do not say that any Senator in the vote he shall give means to stand upon it, but I want to consider it for a moment. First, I deny utterly any such theory, any such element, any such principle being inwrought in our Government. Our whole history denies it.

Did anybody suppose when the whisky rebellion took place in the State of Pennsylvania that the Government of the United States could be called upon to pay citizens for property which they lost? When convents were burned in Maryland and elsewhere did anybody suppose that the Government was to be called upon? All the analogies of the common law, of the most ancient history of law, are against any such theory. If you take the charge made upon the English hundreds for crimes committed in their midst; if you take the statutes charging upon municipal corporations losses which occur in their midst, the whole theory militates with the idea that the Federal Government, that Government which exists as between us and foreign nations, and in some other respects, is the party in the first or in the last instance to be called upon to indemnify citizens because disorder has injured or destroyed their property.

But suppose it were so, Mr. President; suppose this is a domain for us to occupy in our discretion, a question for us to consider: first of all we ought to consider the magnitude of that question. Where is it to stop? Under the narrow enactments of 1815 and 1816 I know a neighbor who told me he heard Mr. Monroe say that the damages proposed arising from the war of 1812 were greater than the whole cost of the war itself; and yet how narrow those provisions were. I wish I had time to show the Senate, standing as they were allowed to stand only about eighteen months, according to my recollection, narrowly restricted, carefully guarded, and still found to have hoisted a flood-gate of claims and demands which would have beggared any Government. Now, here, with half a continent having been in revolt, with hundreds and hundreds of battle-fields thousands of miles apart, with a sea-coast guarded and blockaded three thousand miles in length, what is to be the magnitude of this question if there was some trusteeship existing on the part of the Government to act as watch-dogs for the property of every citizen?

What, I ask the honorable Senator, becomes, in the presence of such an argument as this, of the class of cases which I suggested to him? Is it to be said that those persons who clung to the flag, who stood by the country, and who, solely because they did so, were destroyed in their property and left in the midst of the ashes of their homes by the enemy, have no right to the protection of their Government, that they are not to be paid because, forsooth, the hand which struck the blow, the hand which applied the torch, was not the hand of a Union general, but of a rebel, scourging and crucifying them solely because they were true to their allegiance? Is that to be said?

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin said he did not put it upon the ground of protection. I think that if I were going to put it upon any ground at all I should put it upon a general ground made up of what is right and what is not wrong, which would begin by giving an attentive ear to the cases of those whose property was destroyed by rebels because they were true to their country. This woman's property certainly was not destroyed because she was loyal. Her case is diluted in that respect. She was loyal, but that was an immaterial circumstance. The people to whom I now refer are those whose homes were desolated merely because they were loyal. It seems to me that they have superior equities, and if they would only become diligent creditors of the Government they would have all the elements which ought to entitle them to preferential adjustment and consideration.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator does not, I suppose, really mean to insist that we are more responsible for the acts of our enemies than we are for our own?

Mr. CONKLING. I mean to insist on this—I will state it very broadly, I am quite willing to take the responsibility of stating it—I mean to say that if you once concede the doctrine of protection, the doctrine that the Government is the guardian of the property of the citizens, and bound to indemnify the citizens against the effects of public disorder, then, in my judgment, ethically speaking—speaking in the sense of what is morally right—the superior equity would exist in behalf of a person who stood by the country, who fought for the flag, and whose property, owing to that circumstance alone, was destroyed by that enemy against whom the Government was bound to protect him. I say an equity would exist there superior to that of the person who, not because of loyalty, but because of accident, had his property taken and the building materials put into a fort and the ground used to drill soldiers upon. I am willing to go as far as that. I think if you concede the premise, the doctrine of protection, it applies more strongly in ethics to the case I have just stated than to that on which the Senator insists.

Mr. HOWE. I should not object to that application of the doctrine of protection after the doctrine of protection was fairly established; but what I object to is the argument of the Senator insisting that the Government is more bound to protect the property of its friends against the assaults of its enemies than it is to pay for property we take ourselves.

Mr. CONKLING. That after all, Mr. President, is little more than a very ingenious and well chosen way of repeating in a somewhat different form the cardinal idea of the Senator that this is to be regarded as a mere abstract case of taking property by public authority, incurring at the same time the obligation to make compensation. I have departed from that in the remarks that I have made, and I base my admission to the Senator of what I think to be the superior equities of the case I have suggested, upon the assumption all the time that we are talking about a state of war. If he is talking about a state of peace, or any other state of things upon which this constitutional provision operates, then I agree with him we should be responsible for what we take ourselves, and not for what somebody else took. But when talking about the doctrine of protection, if there is anything against which we are bound to protect citizens it is the lawless inroads of enemies whom we ought to banish as the very first act of protection, and especially should we take care of those who are destroyed by enemies, not by accident, not merely because in general terms they are citizens, but because, especially, they are faithful citizens in their fealty to the Government.

Mr. President, I do not understand any principle upon which this claim can stand; and I did not two or three years ago when with a good deal of labor I examined this whole question and stated the results of my examination. I regret that I have them not here; but I came to the conclusion then that some new principle must be devised—I speak now of a legal principle—some admixture must be made to fit this case; that it could not be found in the cases familiar to us as illustrations, nor in the principles stated in the textbooks upon which those cases were decided.

Somebody has suggested in this debate that as a matter of generosity we might do this. I do not understand any such principle as that applicable at all to the places we hold. Every man has a right to be generous with his own; every man has a right to contribute of his substance to Miss Murphey, and to every other applicant and every other individual; but we sit here only as trustees administering a trust estate; and because we feel generous have we any right to put our hands into the public Treasury and make presents or relieve wants in any form? Not at all. I submit, on the contrary, we must be able to lay our finger upon some authority in the Constitution, in the frame or genius of our Government, upon which we can stand regardless of our feelings of indifference or sympathy, and say: "Here we rest this appropriation; upon this we rely for the precedent which we are setting." Otherwise, not to speak of graver objections, the whole matter of claims would be a matter of caprice; like kissing, it would go by favor. That, I think, will hardly do.

Now, sir, I am persuaded that there is no principle familiar in the legislation of this Government upon which an appropriation of this money can rest; and I am persuaded that by its appropriation we should establish a precedent which would bring in a following that would dizzy all arithmetic. No man can compute, at the end of such a war as this, the amount that could be asked with a plausibility as great as that which sustains this case. That it is a hard one I have no doubt; and I should be very glad to vote following the lead of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin; but with the lights we have before us I shall have to give a vote which has in it not as its chief motive the generosity or the sympathy which in some other capacity I might feel disposed to extend to this claim.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish, sir, that the Committee on Claims should be either placed or left in a false position in regard to this measure and the doctrine upon which it is sought to be supported. I said when I was up before that the Committee on Claims had on several occasions adopted reports involving principles utterly inconsistent with this present claim. I did not say that the honorable chairman of the committee was entirely aware of those reports; perhaps he was not; but that the committee as a committee have acted upon grounds inconsistent with the principles upon which this claim rests is a certain fact. Now, let me call his attention to only two more reports made by that committee to the Senate. The first is the one to which he himself has alluded as having been modified in committee. It was the claim of Margaret A. Russell for a quantity of sugar which was consumed by the Union forces at Vicksburg after its capture and surrender. The report is very short, and I will claim the indulgence of the Senate while I read it:

"It appears that the mercantile firm of Campbell & Bennett, of Mobile, Alabama, were the owners of the property in question; that they assigned it to Crutcher & Co., at Vicksburg, before the siege of that place by the Union troops; that it was in the possession of the consignees on the 25th of May, 1863, and that on that day the owners at Mobile delivered to the petitioner a bill of sale of the sugar, amounting to one hundred and seven thousand two hundred and forty-six pounds net, for $64,347 60, which was at the rate of sixty cents per pound. The proof is satisfactory of the real character of the transaction, though it is evident that payment was made in Confederate money. The Union army was at that time holding Vicksburg in close siege, the result of which was its capture in the following July and the surrender of the entire rebel garrison. On the surrender it appears that the sugar was taken possession of by the Union troops and consumed by them.

"The claim of the petitioner is based upon her allegation, which we do not deny, that she was a loyal person, attached to the Government, never having given aid, comfort, or encouragement to the rebellion.

"But the committee think that in the then existing state of things the United States incurred no liability to indemnify the petitioner.

"We therefore recommend that the claim be rejected."

Here was a case where the Union troops took possession of the property of a loyal citizen, and a woman living in the insurgent States. Another case is perhaps still stronger against this bill, and somewhat peculiar in its features. As that report, also, is very short I will claim the privilege of reading it:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Narcom, of North Carolina, asking compensation for property destroyed by Union troops in 1862 at Edenton, make the following report:

"It appears that the petitioner was a resident and mayor of Edenton, and was a loyal man.

"While he was absent from home on a Government transport, and as the committee are satisfied, acting in the interest of the United States, a body of Union troops, upon the false suggestion of certain rebels there that the petitioner was a secessionist and his house deserted, entered it and took and carried away his personal property to the amount, as he claims, of $1,487. We are satisfied that Mr. Narcom was a true loyal man and that he uniformly showed himself such during the rebellion.

"But we find it impossible to recognize this claim without departing from the general principles which we have recognized in other instances of a similar kind, and therefore recommend that the claim be disallowed."

There are two cases directly in point, and reported from the committee, where the claimants were confessedly loyal, where their property was taken possession of and consumed or destroyed by Union troops in the regular prosecution of the war, and in both cases the committee held, as I trust the Senate will also hold, that the claimants had no just foundation for their claims.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say a word in reply to these adjudications that are urged as a sort of estoppel, a plea in bar here to Miss Murphey's claim—

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all; but to set the committee right.

Mr. HOWE. I tried to set the committee right, so far as this claim is concerned, before the debate began this afternoon, by stating that I did not understand the committee to have assented to the merits of this case. I do not think myself they were consulted upon them, and therefore they did not assent any further than that the case should be reported to the Senate. That, I think, set the committee right.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will excuse me, and allow me to say that I have no recollection of this claim having been before the committee, and no recollection, of course, that any such agreement was entered into by the committee or any member of the committee. For myself I must say that I never should have consented to report this bill if I had known its true character.

Mr. HOWE. My recollection does not enable me to state that the permission of the Senator from Michigan was asked, though I am very strongly inclined to think it was asked if he was in the Senate at the time—during the last days of the last session—because he sits near me, and I should be very likely to ask his permission to report the bill; and I think, with all deference—

Mr. HOWARD. I will not deny that such permission was asked, but certainly I have no recollection of it; and I must repeat that if I had known that such was the real character of the bill, so strong have been my convictions against the principle which is involved, that I should not have given my assent.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator undoubtedly did not assent to any principle involved in the bill; but I think he would have consented still to allow the bill to be reported if he had understood the exact merits of it.

Now, in regard to these adjudications the Senator reads two. One was where a person asked payment for some sugar taken on the capture of Vicksburg. The report states that the claimant was loyal. The report says that the committee decided against the payment. The report is, I suppose, accurate in both statements; but I very well recollect, and I think the Senator remembers, that the case shows that the reasons why we refused to pay for the sugar were these two: first, that the sugar was not taken for the use of the Government in any sense.

Mr. HOWARD. It was taken for the benefit of the Army.

Mr. HOWE. The sugar was appropriated to the use of the soldiers. I suppose it was mere plunder.

Mr. HOWARD. A regular account of it was kept by the quartermaster.

Mr. HOWE. I never understood that it was accounted for in any way.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOWE. I may be wrong, but, after all, I think I am right in that respect. But the other great reason—

Mr. WILLEY. With the Senator's permission I will say that the ground on which I consented to that report was that there was no evidence to satisfy me that the sugar really belonged to the woman who was the claimant, but reason to believe that disloyal persons were seeking to recover through her name.

Mr. HOWE. I was just going to state that other reason. The committee were inclined to believe that the claimant was a mere nominal owner, and that the true owner was a person in Mobile who was a rebel, instead of being a loyal person.

Mr. HOWARD. I must beg leave to say that there was not a particle of proof to that effect, nor any intimation of it. I examined the claim myself, and reported upon it. There was not a scintilla of evidence that there was any collusion between the claimant and anybody else.

Mr. HOWE. But there was evidence that she had obtained it from a party in Mobile.

Mr. HOWARD. By regular sale; and there was a bill of sale in proper form duly authenticated.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, there was a bill of sale there; but this was a young lady, and the purchase-money was a very large sum, and the party from whom she purchased was a rebel, and the law had prohibited all such transfers.

Mr. HOWARD. What law?

Mr. HOWE. A law on the statute-book of 1861 or 1862.

Mr. HOWARD. In the rebel country?

Mr. HOWE. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE. I beg the Senator's pardon. The other case cited by him was a case arising in Edenton, North Carolina, where our troops, not for the benefit of the Government at all, but wantonly, destroyed personal property in a house. They were under the apprehension that the party was a rebel, but it turned out that he was loyal. The Government got no benefit whatever from the property; it was a mere wanton destruction of property; and we have not established the precedent of paying for property destroyed ruthlessly. The ravages of war I believe no member of the committee is in favor of committing the Government to the payment of; but I do not hold this to be within that principle at all, since it was property taken for the use of the Government in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I do not suppose this case will be decided to-day; and therefore, if it is agreeable to the Senate, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire a short executive session.

Mr. WILLEY. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BONTON.

The Journal of the 21st of December last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill, and ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MULLINS. This House is now about to enter upon its last session. The country we represent, both North, East, West, and South, expect it to be done according to the fundamental principles laid down in the Constitution and in the rules of this House. I therefore move that the roll of members be now called.

The question was taken upon the motion that there be a call of the House; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MULLINS. It appears that the noes have it. Nevertheless, I am of opinion that when the matter is tested it will perhaps be found that there is not a quorum present. The country, at whose expense we meet here, will demand of us that we proceed properly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to reserve my right to make a point of order upon any matter not properly embraced in this bill.

WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 16th December, 1868, referred to the Committee on Appropriations the letter from the Postmaster General in answer to the resolution of the House of the 7th of December, relative to the contract for carrying the overland mail; and whereas it appears by a communication from D. B. Ball, special agent of the Post Office Department, to Hon. George McClellan, Second Assistant Postmaster General, that Wells, Fargo & Co., the contractors for the transportation of said mail, have not provided adequate facilities for such transportation, and that express matter has been carried to the exclusion of the mail, which has been left upon the route "day after day and week after week, both day and night, entirely unprotected;" and that "on the 15th of November some six thousand pounds of mail matter lay piled up in an open stock yard at the head of Echo cañon;" and whereas it is reported by the said agent that "there are strong indications that the agents of Wells, Fargo & Co. or their employes had a hand in rifling the letter mail;" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to make no payment to said Wells, Fargo & Co. until a full investigation can be made by the House in regard to the character of the contract made by said Wells, Fargo & Co. with the Post Office Department, and the truth of the charges of the said special agent of the Post Office Department touching the delinquency of said firm in carrying the mail.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to the introduction of the preamble and resolution at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not object to the passage of this resolution at this time. The state of facts set out in the preamble shows that this money should not be paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to a resolution of inquiry. But I think we should have more information before we pass such a resolution as this.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I then give notice that on Monday next I will move to suspend the rules in order to ascertain whether the House will pass the resolution at that time.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1571) to extend the laws relating to the registry of vessels; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR FEES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House if any consular officers of the United States have demanded and received, or are demanding and receiving, for the verification of invoices and other papers which they are required by law to verify, fees greater in amount than are provided by law; and if so, what consular officers have done so, how long such practice has continued, and what is the amount so illegally received by such consular officers respectively; and also that he further inform this House what consular officers now in office have failed or neglected to make return of the business of their offices, according to law, and if any have so neglected to make returns, for how long a time; and that the Secretary of the Treasury further inform this House of the probable amount of money due to the United States now in the hands of such consular officers.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that this inquiry with reference to the reception of illegal fees should not be restricted to a single branch of the public service. Why not make the inquiry broad enough to include all malfeasance of this kind?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I prefer to have this resolution stand in the form in which I have offered it. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] desires further information the better way will be for him to introduce another resolution. The resolution I have offered has been drawn up with a good deal of care, in order to get some specific information which the committee desire.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been adopted.

WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY—AGAIN.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In view of the charges made in the resolution reported from the Committee on Appropriations with reference to Wells, Fargo & Co. and their mail contract, I desire to ask the permission of the House that a resolution may be adopted for the appointment of a special committee to investigate those charges. I do not desire, however, to be a member of the committee, if it should be appointed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA,] who has examined this subject, holds in his hand a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to investigate this whole matter. The Committee on Appropriations, who have the question before them, desire the appointment of a special committee. I hope that the gentleman from New Hampshire will be permitted to offer his resolution, and that it will be adopted by the House.

Mr. ELA. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Postmaster General, in a communication to the House December 16, asks "to have a committee appointed to investigate this whole matter," (of the Wells, Fargo & Co. contract,) "and to examine into the great expense of this transportation through an uninhabited wilderness during the fall and winter seasons, so that in case an application is made for relief Congress can act understandingly on the subject;" and whereas the regular correspondent of the Boston Traveler of December 16, 1868, makes the following charges:

"Among the post routes established during the reign of our Alexander was one two years ago in the Territory of Arizona. At least it is supposed the route was established, from the reason that a contract was awarded to one Mr. Paston, a brother of the Delegate from that Territory, to carry the mails over said route for the handsome sum of $90,000 per year.

"Everything was going on smoothly, and not a murmur of discontent was heard about this contract, for no one knew of it at the time it was made except the parties directly interested. Now for the sequel. The bill for the first year's service came in, and was promptly paid by the Department. The affair now is no longer a secret; but Governor McCormick, of Arizona, learns in an indirect manner that $90,000 a year is being expended to carry the mails over a route in the Territory of which he is Governor. He examines into the matter, and in a letter to the Post Office Department, signed in his capacity of Governor, and with seal attached, he reports that "not a single letter or an ounce of mail matter has ever been carried over the route," pronounces it a swindle from beginning to end, and protests against the payment of any more money. The contractor becomes alarmed, and hastens at once to Washington to fix up matters. The second year's bill is presented for payment, but the pay clerk, with Governor McCormick's letter before him, refuses to pay it. An intimate personal friend of Randall's appears on the scene; has several interviews with him. On the day following one of these interviews the pay clerk has a note laid before him. It reads: 'Pay this bill. A. W. R., Postmaster General.' The bill is paid, and the contractor leaves in high glee.

"But this is not all. The Postmaster General within a year has made a contract with a line of Baltimore steamers, running to Havana and touching at Key West, to carry the mails, two trips a month, for $1,000 a trip, when the regular ocean postage by all other lines is only seven cents a letter. The line running from New York was found amply sufficient for the public needs at the regular price. Now for the result:

"During the month of October, 1868, the steamer Maryland made two trips. All told she carried both to and from Havana—including newspapers—mails which estimated at rate paid for 'sea service' would amount to $169.04; but instead of this amount, she received the sum of $2,000.

"The steamer Cuba also made two trips, carrying mails which would have entitled her to $73.48; but instead of this a check is sent by the Post Office Department for $2,000.

"Again I say, let a committee be appointed which will investigate the inner workings of Mr. Randall's Department, and not seek to cover up, and evidence will be found which will startle the whole country. Give me such a committee and the evidence will be forthcoming."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must object to that preamble, which embraces simply extracts from newspaper reports.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the resolution be adopted, then, without the preamble.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am willing that a resolution should be adopted for the appointment of a special committee to investigate these charges.

Mr. ELA. I ask consent, then, to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed to investigate the matters and charges called for and above set forth, and also the manner in which the mail service has been performed; and whether any mail service has been increased which was not warranted; and if so, to what extent and at what cost; and whether any money has been paid to contractors without certificate of service performed; and if so to whom, and by whose order and to what extent; with power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, and report at any time.

Mr. McKEE. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope, then, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] will on Monday move to suspend the rules, that his resolution may be offered and adopted.

SITE FOR EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1574) in relation to a site for the Executive Mansion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

LINCOLN ART ASSOCIATION.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1572) to incorporate the Lincoln Art Association of Washington city, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ARTHUR M. LEE.

Mr. CULLOM also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1573) for the relief of Arthur M. Lee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENT.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, &c., That it is the imperative duty of this Government to develop its resources, increase its revenue, and retain its surplus gold, with a view to as speedy a return to specie payment as is possible; that it will retard this purpose, disturb values, and interfere with the revenue to contract the currency or to fix the day by law when specie payments shall commence until natural causes have more nearly approximated the values of legal-tender notes and gold.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

IMPORTED ANIMALS FOR BREEDING PURPOSES.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1575) to repeal so much of former laws as impose duties on animals imported from foreign countries for breeding purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

JACOB BAUGHMAN.

Mr. KOONTZ introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1576) granting a pension to Jacob Baughman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ADDITIONAL BOUNTY.

Mr. KOONTZ also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 389) giving additional bounty under the act of 28th July, 1866, and the several acts amendatory thereof, to persons who served three years and were honorably discharged, notwithstanding they may have been borne upon the rolls as slaves; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NEW MAIL ROUTE IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CALLIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1577) to provide for the establishment of a mail route from Scottsboro, in Jackson county, in the State of Alabama, to Cottonville, in Marshall county, in the same State, and for the establishment of certain post offices therein named; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

UNITED STATES SCOUTS.

Mr. CALLIS also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 390) for the relief of loyal citizens of Alabama who acted as United States scouts during the late war; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. For what time?

Mr. LYNCH. Perhaps five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LYNCH. It is with great reluctance that for the first time since I became a member of this House I feel compelled to occupy its time in the consideration of a matter personal to myself, but which at the same time must interest, if it does not in some degree affect, all the members of this body. I hold in my hand an editorial article cut from the Cincinnati Gazette of the 23d ultimo, headed "An Abuse of the Franking Privilege," which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read the portions which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Members not only frank their own letters and documents, but they frank the correspondence and publications of other people. They go so far even as to sell their franks for money. This is a direct fraud upon the people, and it should disgrace the members who practice it."

"Let us state a case in point: there came to the Cincinnati post office yesterday five mail bags filled with a paper called the New York Mercantile Journal, amounting in all to about five thousand copies. Each of these papers bore the frank of JOHN LYNCH, M. C. Upon referring to the Congressional Directory we find that JOHN LYNCH, M. C., is from Portland, Maine. We also find that his name is not written but stamped upon the wrappers. Now, how did the New York publisher come into the possession of Mr. LYNCH's stamp? Did he forge the name? Did he purchase it of Mr. LYNCH? Or how did he come to use it? On the papers sent to this post office alone the postage of which the Government has been defrauded amounts to $100. Probably one hundred thousand copies of the paper were sent out altogether, on which the postage would be $2,000. The New York publisher could well afford to pay Mr. LYNCH $1,000 for the use of the stamp, and if Mr. LYNCH's stamp is in the market he doubtless realizes a handsome income from the sale of it."

Mr. LYNCH. I should, perhaps, have passed this matter by, contenting myself with the brief explanation made through the telegraph by the correspondents of the leading newspapers of the country, had not this explanation been called in question and the charge, in substance, reiterated by the journal which originated the libel; and had not my attention also been attracted to an editorial article of similar import in a paper edited by a member of this House, (the Worcester Spy,) which paper I also send to the Clerk, and ask that the paragraphs which I have marked may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"In the case of JOHN LYNCH, M. C., mentioned above, who, by the way, is a Representative from Maine, the postage on the five thousand newspapers which were fraudulently smuggled through the post office by means of the fac simile of his signature stamped upon them, was, of course, $100. The New York publisher probably evaded the postage in the same way on copies of his paper sent to other offices beside Cincinnati. What proportion of his issue went to the latter city cannot be told with accuracy, but it would probably be much within bounds to say that fifty thousand copies were sent out altogether, the postage on which would be $1,000. Of course he could well afford to pay Mr. LYNCH half that sum for the use of his stamp on this single occasion, and if Mr. LYNCH's stamp is in the market he doubtless realizes a handsome income from it."

It may be, and we hope is, the case that Mr. LYNCH's stamp has been counterfeited and that he has never authorized this use of it. If he has sold or lent his stamp to this publisher, or given him authority to counterfeit it, he has, of course, stolen just so much from the Treasury, and merits expulsion from Congress for the fraud."

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, this gross libel upon myself in particular, and by innuendo upon every member of this House, it will be observed has no other foundation or excuse, save the fact that a large quantity of newspapers were received at the Cincinnati post office for distribution under my fac simile frank, directed by full name and address to certain postmasters and business men. The attention of the editor having been called to the matter, probably by the postmaster or mail contractor, (the only parties whose interests are affected by the increase of mail matter, the Department incurring no additional expense by the increased quantity,) he immediately, without inquiry into the facts, either by examining one of the papers, or by asking me through the telegraph whether the franking was authorized, proceeded to publish the article which I have had read, calling attention to the remarkable fact that newspapers bearing my stamped frank had been received at the Cincinnati post office; hinting that possibly the frank might have been forged, but intimating very broadly that it had probably been sold, (as that was a very common practice with members,) and that I was realizing a large income from such sale; and calling upon Congress to expel me. Is not this a very gross libel to be fabricated out of such small material—to be founded upon such slight grounds of suspicion?

The facts in regard to this matter are briefly these: a speech made by me in this House on introducing some financial bills attracted the favorable attention of the editor of the New York Mercantile Journal, and was published in that paper. As one of the bills is made a special order for an early day in the present session, and as financial questions are now attracting much attention, I desired to give the bills and the speech explaining and advocating them as wide a circulation as possible, and franked a large number of copies of the paper to postmasters and business men in the same manner and for precisely the same reason that I had previously franked pamphlet copies of the same speech. I presume I was influenced by the same motives that govern members generally in circulating speeches made by them in this House.

The franking was done under my own personal supervision. The right of members to frank newspapers when they please, where they please, and to whom they please, whether containing speeches made by themselves or not, has been uniformly practiced, and I have never before heard the right questioned or its exercise characterized an abuse by any one; and, as in the present case, the papers franked contained a speech delivered by me, I not only conformed to the uniform practice, but to the strict letter of the law, using the privilege for one of the very purposes for which it was conferred.

I presume there is not a member of this House, desirous of circulating his speech, who would not prefer to do so through the medium of a respectable newspaper rather than by pamphlet if he could do so on the same terms. I certainly shall avail myself of this medium whenever I choose to, so long as the law authorizes it. The right to do so is precisely the same as that by which a newspaper publisher sends and receives all his exchanges free, and also sends his paper free to subscribers within the county where the same is published.

This explanation is all I should feel called upon to make if the paper which first published the libel had made a frank and honest retraction, and had not some other journals, in their zeal to expose the abuse of the franking privilege, seized upon this case, and continued to use it as an illustration of such abuse, after all the facts in regard to it had been made public.

As it is, I desire to say this much further:

1. That fac simile franks, as is well known, are used by all heads of Departments and heads of bureaus, and very generally by members of Congress, and members who do not use them authorize clerks to write franks for them.

2. That during the presidential campaign just closed the stamps of members of both political parties were left with national, State, and other committees here and in various parts of the country, and used by such committees in the absence of the members to frank political documents.

Tons of newspapers, speeches, essays, and compilations of political matter, not one tenth part of which was by law entitled to be franked at all, were circulated through the mails free under cover of these franks.

3. All these facts were perfectly well known to the Cincinnati postmaster, whose office must have received from the committee-rooms here and distributed large quantities of such documents; they were equally well known to the editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, who had received such documents from the congressional committee-room through the mails—as I am informed by his own order—and to every editor who has commented unfavorably upon my sending papers containing my own speech under my own frank. All knew of this unauthorized use of the franking privilege, and knew that campaign papers and other documents published in their own offices were circulated through the mails under it, and yet never called attention to it as an abuse.

The statement I have made shows the unfairness of the attack upon myself to which I have called attention; and here, right here, I leave the matter without further comment.

Mr. BALDWIN. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to this matter, which will not require five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Maine, in the first place, that he cannot suppose I am in any manner responsible for the appearance of that article in the Worcester Spy with comments; and, in the second place, that when this statement appeared in the Cincinnati Gazette, and especially after it was copied into the Spy, I felt a special interest in the matter. My knowledge of the gentleman from Maine made it impossible for me to believe that the facts, as set forth and construed in the Cincinnati Gazette, could be true. It seemed to me impossible. I could not believe they were true in the manner and to the extent represented. I felt moved to make inquiry in regard to the matter. The result of my investigation was, that in that case the whole thing consisted in the franking of his own speech printed in a newspaper, and that therefore the act was entirely within the law and legitimate. Whatever criticism shall be made on the case should be made on the law itself, and not on the use of it. For the rest, I say confidently that no one who knows him believes the gentleman from Maine capable of selling his frank. Moreover it is undoubtedly true that there are abuses of the franking privilege which are not warranted or rather occasioned by law. They are uses of the franking wholly outside of law, and have no legitimate warrant whatever. These abuses of the franking privilege, as well as certain other uses of it which are entirely legitimate, make it necessary, in my view, that we should take into consideration the duty of so restricting and reducing that privilege, by modifying the law, as to prevent these abuses and confine the matter of franking to what may absolutely be required by the public service.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas resolutions have been introduced and passed in both Houses of Congress severely condemning the late message of the President of the United States, especially upon the subject of the national finances and his suggestions relative to the alleviation of the national embarrassment; and whereas it is the right and duty of the President to "give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall deem necessary and expedient:

Be it therefore resolved, that such resolutions are an infringement upon the rights of the Executive, and calculated to obviate the faithful discharge of his constitutional duty; and that however much the Congress may differ with the President upon his recommendation in regard to the discharge of the national debt, it involves a question which should be maturely considered by every American citizen, and which the American people have the right to determine, as they doubtless will in their own good time, governed by the precedents and principles which have controlled the enlightened nations of the world, and according to the exigencies which surround them, and in a manner, too, which will vindicate their own credit and honor.

Resolved, That one hundred thousand copies of the late annual message of the President be published for the benefit of the people of the United States.

Mr. MULLINS. I object, unless the gentleman can show the authority for the President to repudiate the national debt.

Mr. BOUFWELL moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills and resolutions were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POOR OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that call for the purpose of taking up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 693) for the temporary relief of the poor and destitute people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is great destitution and suffering in the District, and if any appropriation is made it ought to be made now. I will yield to allow that bill to be passed.

The bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

It appropriates $30,000 for the relief of the poor of the District, to be expended under the direction of the mayors of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the president of the levy court of the District.

Mr. McKEE. I object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. McKEE. I decline to withdraw it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules to-day?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CARY. I rise to a personal explanation for five minutes, if there be no objection. No objection was made.

Mr. CARY. I find that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] is not the only member of this House who has been the object of attack by the Cincinnati Gazette. I send to the Clerk, and ask to have read, an extract from that paper, in which I find myself charged with similar delinquencies.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is probably true that many of the stamps made for members of Congress are duplicated, and the duplicates used without authority. In so far as franks are thus forged the frauds may be detected by requiring postmasters to report all cases of probable fraud to the Department. In the case of the five thousand papers received in this city from New York it was evident that some one had committed a fraud. This might have been detected at once by reporting the case to Washington.

"Since public attention has been called to this matter, frauds are likely to be exposed to such an extent that Congressmen will exercise some caution, for a while, at least. Here is another case, in which Hon. S. F. CARY is concerned:

"COLUMBUS, OHIO, December 26, 1863.

"To the Editor of the Cincinnati Gazette:

"You called public attention to an abuse of the franking privilege recently. I inclose another sample received in this city yesterday. It comes here covering a paper from West Chester, Pennsylvania, and has been used for that purpose for some months past. Perhaps my old friend, now your 'working-man,' may have found his name worth something.

Here we have a paper published at West Chester, Pennsylvania, circulated free through the mails under the frank of 'S. F. CARY, M. C.' This has been done regularly for some time past, our correspondent informs us. Thus publishers are able to send their papers to subscribers free of postage—a very economical way for publishers, but a fraud upon the people."

Mr. CARY. I simply wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that my genuine frank has been used for no such purpose as that stated in this article. I know of no newspaper published in West Chester, Pennsylvania. I have never given my frank to any paper published there or elsewhere. Knowing the Gazette as well as I do, if the article had not been copied into respectable papers like the New York Tribune and commented upon, I should have taken no notice of it whatever, as I do not consider that paper capable of slandering me where its character and my own are known. The Gazette seems to have the franking privilege "on the brain." I addressed a letter to the postmaster at West Chester, Pennsylvania, inquiring about this matter, and in his reply (which I hold in my hand, but which I will not occupy time by reading) he says that no such use of my frank has been made at that office. I have no further remarks to make upon this subject.

DESERTION.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making more liberal provisions by law for the removal of the charge of desertion not of a serious or aggravated character against soldiers in the late civil war, and particularly as to the propriety of relaxing the rule withholding bounty from otherwise meritorious soldiers who have received honorable discharges, but against whom charges of desertion rest.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of relaxing the rule withholding pensions from soldiers or their widows or heirs on account of charges of desertion, when such soldiers have received honorable discharges or may have lost their lives while in the Army and in the line of their duty.

Resolved, also, That each of said committees be instructed to report by bill or otherwise.

WAR CLAIMS OF IOWA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The House, as the regular order, resumes the consideration of the bill reported on the 10th of December last from the Committee on Military Affairs, being the bill (H. R. No. 1491) fixing the amount found to be due to the State of Iowa on account of certain claims against the United States.

The bill, which was read, recites in the preamble that Congress, by an act approved July 25, 1864, directed the President to appoint a commissioner to examine and report upon the claims of the State of Iowa for forage, transportation, subsistence, and clothing furnished by that State to volunteers; also for repayment of certain moneys paid by the State in raising, arming, and equipping, paying, and subsisting certain troops of the State during the late rebellion; and also the claims of the State for certain forage procured, barracks built and turned over to the United States; and that the commissioner appointed by the President, after examination of said claims, has reported that there is due the State of Iowa $229,848 23, and recommended the payment of the same. The bill, therefore, provides that the amount so found due to the State of Iowa shall be paid to the State out of an appropriation hereafter to be made.

The SPEAKER. When this bill was last under consideration the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] moved to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That no payments shall be made until all the accounts have been examined and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report a general bill comprehending similar claims of all the States, and the provisions of a substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] and accepted by his colleague, [Mr. WOOD.] The proposed substitute will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following clause be, and the same is hereby, added to the provisions of the act approved the 27th day of July, 1861, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," to wit: "But if any such vouchers are not in the form ordinarily in use in the War Department, or do not strictly correspond with the regulations now prescribed by or in pursuance of law, the amount of any such vouchers may be allowed and paid on such evidence that they are just and correct as may be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury. This act and the act hereby amended shall apply to the city of New York, and to any costs, charges, and expenses incurred by it for any of the objects or purposes above mentioned."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am appealed to by members to withdraw the demand for the previous question; and I do so, and yield to the gentleman from Iowa to offer an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to learn whether a quorum is present I give notice that I shall call for a division on the next vote.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment to the instructions submitted by the gentleman from New York, for the reason that under those instructions the Iowa claim would be excluded. I propose to have it included in this examination. And I wish to say that the Iowa delegation have no disposition to prevent examination of this claim. All we desire is that if we refer it to the committee they will examine it and submit a report during this session.

I move to add to the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] the following:

And also to all the claims of the State of Iowa which were presented and passed upon by the commissioner appointed under the act approved July 25, 1866.

That, of course, refers to claims embraced in this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now renew the demand for the previous question; and pending that I will yield to gentlemen to introduce bills for reference, with the understanding that they are not to be brought back by motions to reconsider.

IOWA WAR CLAIMS—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1491) fixing the amount found to be due to the State of Iowa on account of certain claims against the United States, the pending question being on seconding the previous question, on which Mr. RANDALL had demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that he will accomplish his object by consenting to consider the previous question as seconded and calling the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. RANDALL. I accept the suggestion.

The previous question was accordingly seconded; and, on ordering the main question,

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 24, not voting 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Clarke, Clift, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gove, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Raun, Ross, Sawyer, Seafield, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Wood, and Young—97.

So the main question was ordered.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to add to the instructions the words "and also to all the claims of the State of Iowa which were presented to and passed upon by the commissioner appointed under the act approved July 25, 1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the motion of Mr. WOOD, to refer the substitute of Mr. PRUYN to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report a general bill comprehending similar claims of all the States, as just amended on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, also moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills, &c., were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF TOOLS.

Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report in writing in response to the resolution of the House instructing the committee to inquire into the legality and regularity of the purchase of tools by Theodore Zeller, chief engineer of the Philadelphia navy-yard; and moved that the report be recommitted and printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. STEWART. I wish it understood that that is not the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is the report of a sub-committee.

Mr. KELLEY. My colleague is in error. The committee appointed a sub-committee to proceed and make a personal examination and to examine witnesses. That sub-committee reported, and the Naval Committee at a regular meeting, by formal vote, instructed me to make this report as the report of the committee, and ask that it be printed for the use of the committee and recommitted to the committee. I am not acting as one of the sub-committee, but as the organ of the Naval Committee in this matter.

Mr. STEWART. My colleague will excuse me, but, as I understand, the Committee on Naval Affairs has not as yet taken any action on that report excepting to give leave that the report may be made to the House, to be printed for the use of the committee for further action.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is right and wrong. It is not the final report of the committee, or they would not ask that it should be recommitted, but it is, in so far as wanting it printed and recommitted, the report of the Naval Committee, whose representative I am in asking this. It is not presented as a final report.

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Naval Affairs did not take any definite action on this report. I have not read it, nor have several members of the committee. The understanding was that it should go back for further consideration.

Mr. KELLEY. And that is precisely what I am asking.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York insist that this report was not authorized to be made by the committee?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no; I do not; but as I understand it the committee desire the report printed for the use of the committee alone.

Mr. KELLEY. That is what I have asked.

Mr. STEWART. It is no expression of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will find on page 55 of the Digest that "if it is disputed that a report has been ordered to be made by a committee, the question of reception must be put to the House."

Mr. STEWART. I do not in that sense object.

The report was then recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed for the use of the committee.

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

Mr. KELLEY, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 728) relating to the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department.

The bill proposes to provide that from and after this date, to secure the further efficiency of the Navy, a civilian may be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill the position of chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy Department.

Mr. KELLEY. There were many considerations moving the committee to the approval of this bill. I beg leave to state a few of them. There is no branch of science in which more progress has been made within the last quarter of a century than that of engineering. The science of engineering and the tools and appliances used by engineers or in the construction of steam engines have probably improved more rapidly than any other department of science or the useful arts. The engineer corps of the Navy is necessarily a small one. The number of chief engineers is but fifty-two. There are many men of mark in that corps. But the field of their operations is circumscribed. There is a much wider field for the development of engineering skill and judgment in the general civil service of the country, in the development of our mechanical and material resources, and in the wide field of the steam commercial marine. The committee believe that the Government should have access in selecting an engineer-in-chief to this wider field of experience and study than the Navy with its formulas and, to use a popular phrase, red tape affords. It is not believed by the Naval Committee that our Navy exhibits the highest character of engineering. Reports come to us from line officers on every station and other observers that our vessels move by steam alone, while those of other nations with more adequate steam apparatus resort to their sails while cruising on stations, and thus save the fuel ours consume and the wear and tear of machinery they are undergoing. Line officers report to us from every station that our vessels, when they move impelled by our style of engines, move only to look at the sterns of competing vessels, even of those of the little South American States which have navies.

It was therefore believed that great good would accrue to the service by authorizing the head of the Navy Department or the President of the United States to look over the whole field of engineers and select, if he can find one, a Stephenson or an Ericsson, that we might in our naval service enjoy the economy that is practiced and the efficiency attained by other nations. These are some of the views that controlled the Committee on Naval Affairs in instructing me to report this bill.

So far as I am personally concerned I am, however, ready to enforce its adoption by other suggestions. But if any gentleman desires information on any special point in connection with this subject I will gladly yield to him, to hear and answer his question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I really should like some further information than the gentleman has given us before I vote for the creation of another office. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] very well understands the number of bureaus in the Navy Department. I believe they amount to no less than nine, and among them all this Bureau of Steam Engineering has been the source of more trouble, complaint, and expense to the Government than all the other bureaus there; and I cannot, with the explanation of the gentleman, so far as I have heard it, assent to the creation of another bureau with another salaried officer. I did not catch the gentleman's idea of what particular benefit he expects the Government will receive from this office, and therefore I do not fully understand why we should create another bureau in the Navy Department at the present time.

Mr. KELLEY. The bill does not contemplate the creation of another office; it does, however, open the possibility, as the gentleman has suggested, of adding one to the number of chief engineers. The office of engineer-in-chief is now a distinctive office; but that officer must, under existing laws, be selected from the engineer corps of the Navy. I apprehend that there would have been a saving to the Government of tens, indeed I think I may say of hundreds of millions of dollars, if we had had such an engineer-in-chief, as might have been selected from civil life instead of having the engineer department of the Navy managed as it has been during the war.

I ask the gentleman whether, among the numerous complaints of which he speaks, he has not heard those to which I have alluded, namely, that we have the slowest Navy in the world; that in the strife between the engineer corps and the line the engineer corps, endeavoring to exalt itself above the line, have made our ships depend entirely upon steam, fuel, and machinery, so that the engineer shall be the important man on the ship, and subordinate to him the naval officer to whom the command belongs?

The result of this attempt of the engineer corps to subordinate the line has been that while the vessels of other nations sail to distant stations and from point to point while on stations, using steam as an auxiliary and in exigencies, our vessels have not adequate sails and rigging to move them, burdened as they are with machinery and fuel, even with fair breezes. When they change their location they must resort to coal, no matter how many hundred dollars per ton it may cost us. The saving in this matter alone will equal the salary not only of an engineer-in-chief but the pay of a large part of the engineer corps.

Has not the gentleman from Illinois also heard that under the management of our present engineer-in-chief, the cherished head of the engineer corps of the Navy, we have a ship said to be the fleetest on the ocean, the Wampanoag, but which cannot carry her own fuel for a month together with food for the competent number of officers and men for the same time? So much of her room is taken up by engines, coal-bunkers, fire-room, &c., that the officers in command of what is boasted of as the fleetest ship in the world are compelled to occupy quarters less commodious than are allowed on ordinary merchant ships moved by steam. It is possible that in selecting some future Stephenson or Ericsson an additional office may be created; but if he shall give us a navy which, when on stations, doing merely watch duty, can move as the ships of other navies do, under sail—which, when merely making formal cruises can, as other vessels do, move under sail—you will find that he will, as I have already intimated, save each day to the Treasury of the country more than the annual salary of the engineer-in-chief of the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt the truth of what the gentleman says. His remarks only corroborate what I have already stated as to the complaints, the just complaints, which have been made in regard to this Bureau of Steam Engineering. But I differ with the gentleman as to the remedy. I do not conceive it necessary for us, in order to obtain a remedy for these things, to create a new officer.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman state the remedy he would suggest?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would turn out the present officer and put in a better man.

Mr. KELLEY. Can you find such a man in the engineer corps?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know. I presume a good man can be found in the engineer corps.

Mr. KELLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that thus far I have been speaking for the committee, and expressing the views which I heard expressed around me in the committee-room when the bill was under consideration. I will now speak for myself, and present some facts that impel me to support the bill which I was directed by the committee to present and advocate. I say that the esprit du corps, as disclosed in a series of stupid or corrupt transactions, is so widely diffused in our engineer corps of the Navy that I would not trust the corps to indicate its own chief or advise the head of the Government as to his selection.

Sir, the steam navy depends upon its machinery. I reiterate what I have already said, that the progress of science with reference to appliances for erecting and managing machinery exceeds the progress made in any other branch of useful science during the last quarter of a century. Yet, I tell the gentleman from Illinois and you, Mr. Speaker, that within the last two years your engineer corps have been buying out old machine-shops and converting the machine-shops of your navy-yards into old-junk-shops. I tell you that at the Philadelphia navy-yard, under the shadow of the shops of the most celebrated tool-makers in the country, William Sellers & Co. and Bement & Dougherty, they have purchased within eighteen months tools that were superannuated twenty years ago; that they have bought tools such as you cannot find in any modern workshops in the United States or Europe; that they have paid $20,000 for three superannuated or worn-out tools which any practical engineer in the country would swear would not be worth in a machine-shop the space they occupy if the proprietors had the means of buying adequate tools. And, sir, I tell you more, that they have paid for scrap-iron which still retains the general form of machines more money than would have bought new tools in Philadelphia, Newark, New Jersey, Providence, Rhode Island, Worcester, Massachusetts, or at any other point in the country at which tools for the manufacture of steam engines are made. These facts will hereafter come before you, sir, officially, though I now state them on my personal authority only.

My argument is, sir, that for the purpose of breaking up—whichever it may be—the complicity in crime or the esprit du corps of the engineer corps we should allow the incoming Administration to select an engineer-in-chief from the widest field. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this suggestion: that so widely diffused is the esprit du corps in the engineer corps, or so complete is the complicity in wrong among its head and certain members, that we should let the light of practical judgment and the general integrity of the community go into that Department and endeavor to reclaim, if possible, our Navy from its destroyers and our Treasury from those who are bleeding it to death.

I beg leave to remark to gentlemen from New England that if they will go to the navy-yard at Portsmouth they will find there boxed up under sheds, for which the Government has no use, and which, though bought more than eighteen months ago, have not been set up, old tools bought from an engine manufactory, which was being abandoned, not because the proprietor was giving up the business, but because he had bought a new shop, and it was better for him to sell his old tools to the engineer department of the United States Navy than to remove them to his new shop near by the old one. For the Philadelphia yard they have bought a planer after eleven years' use, part of the time in the city of Philadelphia, part in the city of St. Louis, and part in the works of John Roach & Son, New York, from whom it was bought for $6,600, when they could have bought a new one from Bement & Dougherty, its makers, or the Gould Machine Company, Newark, New Jersey, or any of the manufacturers of such tools, for $6,000. So, eleven years of use, transportation about the country, and repairing damage, made that old tool worth to the engineers of the Navy $600, or ten per cent. more than a first-class new tool fresh from the shop of its makers or their rivals in business.

These are some of the reasons which I urge personally. The broad comprehensive reasons are those by which the committee were governed. The information I am laying before you had not reached any of the members of the committee when they acted on the bill under consideration, and therefore I am not at liberty to speak for other members of the committee on this branch of the subject. But on my personal responsibility I state these facts, and stand prepared to prove them before the House in conjunction with a vast mass more damning than any I have referred to; and I think the gentleman from Illinois will probably find that he will promote economy even if the incoming Administration should add a chief engineer to the corps, and save countless millions of dollars.

Mr. MAYNARD. Cannot the Secretary now secure the best engineering and skill outside?

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; he is confined to the selection of the engineer-in-chief to the limited corps of chief engineers in the Navy; and, as pertinent to the gentleman's question, I will say that two naval boards, two boards of engineers—and from that fact I derive my conviction of complicity—two naval boards, with these facts staring them in the face, with this evidence drawn from the files of the department of steam engineering at Philadelphia navy-yard, with no conflict of testimony between individuals on several of the points, the papers speaking for themselves, and I have them here—two boards of engineers have found these transactions honest and honorable and advantageous to the United States Government. It appears from the papers in the engineer department, official copies of which I hold in my hand, that in August, 1866, when the decline in prices in such things after the close of the war had but begun, William Sellers & Co. offered the department twenty-five ton cranes, wood-work, iron-work, the machines all complete, for $2,000; and here, under the same certificate of the department, from papers furnished by the same office, it is in evidence that in 1868, when the average of fifteen per cent. fall had taken place, they bought from John Roach & Sons inferior cranes of the same size for $2,250, the price of William Sellers & Co. at the same date for the same cranes having fallen to $1,690. They paid John Roach & Sons $2,250 when they had official evidence before them that William Sellers & Co., the men who carried off the gold medal at the recent International Exposition, would furnish them for $1,690. Again, sir, the same official papers show that they received on the 24th of August, 1866, offers from Bement & Dougherty, the rivals of William Sellers & Co., for fifteen-ton cranes at $1,500, and that eighteen months thereafter, with a declining market, they paid to their favorites, John Roach & Sons, $1,750 each for five of these cranes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not know what this has to do with my question.

Mr. KELLEY. I am coming to the point. Citizens of Philadelphia were outraged by seeing the navy-yard gorged like a "junk-shop" with old tools brought from different parts of the country. They appealed to the Navy Department, and the Navy Department appointed a board of naval engineers to investigate the matter, and with these facts before them they whitewashed the transaction and reported that they saw nothing dishonest in these things. An appeal from their decision was made to the Secretary of the Navy, and another board of engineers was appointed and gave these transactions their approval. That is the reason I wish to go outside of the corps for an officer to indicate boards of inquiry. I will not further delay action on this bill, but will hereafter discuss the matters I have broached in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, in answer to House resolution of the 16th ultimo, stating that no reduction can be made in the force of employees in that Department, &c., and that the continual increase of business will soon require the employment of additional force; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of May 25, 1868, a statement of the amount of dividends declared by the national banking associations since their organization, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that that body had passed an act (S. No. 738) to relieve from disabilities John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 1429) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message of the last session.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CULLOM in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message of 1867.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to advocate the claims of a great national enterprise in which the people of my State and of the whole country have a profound interest; an enterprise which I will endeavor to show is in all respects practicable and meritorious; one that will cost the Government no money, but will save vast sums to the Treasury, and which will strengthen the public credit, largely augment the public revenues, and reduce the public burdens. My time is limited and my facts are numerous; I will, therefore, proceed at once to its discussion. When Mr. Edwin F. Johnson, Governor Stevens, and others, first presented the claims of the Northern Pacific railroad they encountered many objections and obstacles interposed by those who were not well informed in regard to it. Since then, however, the discussions here and the surveys and explorations of the country through which the road is to pass have thrown a flood of light upon the proposition, and to-day there is no great enterprise which lies nearer to the hearts of the people than this.

In attempting to point out some of the peculiar advantages of this route I would not be understood as depreciating the merits of others for I fully admit their inestimable value to the country, and will go with him who goes furthest in conceding to them every necessary and proper encouragement.

The Central line, born in the darkness and agony of the nation's struggle, and matured with an energy unprecedented, will ever stand one of the proudest monuments of American courage, enterprise, and statesmanship.

The Kansas Pacific road, yet in its infancy, with only some four hundred miles completed, has, in its beneficial results to the Government, far surpassed the hopes of its most sanguine friends, and fully demonstrated the wisdom of that policy by which it has been thus far aided, as well as the propriety, safety, and necessity of granting to it such additional assistance as may be required to insure its completion to the Pacific.

But while thus conceding the merits of other roads I insist that, in regard to its length, its gradients, climate, its water communications and facilities for construction and operation, its agricultural and mineral resources, its relation to foreign and domestic commerce, its probable influence in promoting immigration, its effect upon the "Indian question," and upon the general development and prosperity of the country, the Northern road has merits and advantages which demand the prompt and efficient recognition of the Government.

ITS LENGTH.

This route seems to have been pointed out by nature as the line of communication between the waters of the two oceans. Toward the west the St. Lawrence and the great lakes reach half way across the continent, while on the same parallel of latitude the Pacific, trending eastward, extends an arm to the great inland sea of Puget sound, leaving a distance of only 1,775 miles between the waters of the two oceans. By the Central route, from San Francisco to Chicago, the distance from ocean to lake is not less than 2,400 miles, making a difference in favor of the Northern route of 650 miles. Governor Stevens has shown by carefully prepared tables that from New York city to the Pacific ocean the difference in distance as between the Northern and Central routes is 420 miles in favor of the former, and that the average distance by this route from Puget sound to the principal ports of the Atlantic and the Gulf is 316 miles less than the average distance from San Francisco to the same points; and that if equated distances are compared, the difference in favor of the Northern route will be increased 137 miles, making a total of 483 miles.

ITS GRADIENTS.

In its gradients, also, the Northern route has superior advantages. On this point I beg leave to read from the report of a select committee of this House made in 1864:

"The sum of ascents and descents from St. Paul to Seattle (on Puget sound) is 21,737 feet against 29,387 on the Central. These figures give the best practical index of the effect of the gradients to increase the cost of transportation. Engineers allow one mile for every 52.08 feet of rise or fall, as denoting the additional working expense over a level route, which would add to the Northern route 412 miles, and to the Central route 550 miles."

The highest elevations on the Northern route are 5,330 feet, (Cadot's pass,) and 3,000 feet at the Snoqualmie pass. The greatest elevations on the Central route (already overcome by the Union and Central Pacific roads) are Evans's pass, 3,242 feet; Rattlesnake pass, 7,560 feet, and Bridger's pass, 7,534 feet; making a difference between the two greatest elevations on either road of 3,912 feet in favor of the Northern line. I make this comparison with the Central road because that road having been constructed demonstrates the practicability of building the Northern, where the gradients are far lighter.

And in order that my motives may not be misunderstood, I wish to state explicitly that in the foregoing comparisons, and in all others that may be made of this with the Central route, I have selected the latter solely because of my desire to compare the Northern with one the practicability and entire success of which is no longer doubtful.

CLIMATE.

The greatest obstacles which it was once imagined the Northern route would encounter were the extreme cold and deep snows. That we have nothing to fear from these causes is now so well settled that discussion is unnecessary, and I will content myself with quoting a few items from the volume of testimony on the subject.

Lieutenant Mullen, who spent four winters surveying and constructing a wagon-road extending over a considerable portion of the Northern route, says:

"The temperature of Walla Walla in 46° is similar to that of Washington city in 38° latitude; that of Clark's Fork in 48° to that of St. Joseph's, Missouri, in latitude 41°; that of the Bitter Root Valley in 46° is similar to that of Philadelphia in latitude 40°, with about the same amount of snow, and, with the exception of a few days of intense cold, about the same average temperature." * * * "From Fort Laramie to Clark's Fork I call this an atmosphere of heat, varying in width from one to one hundred miles. On its either side, north and south, are walls of cold air, and which are so clearly perceptible that you always detect them when you are upon its shores.

"This affects the kingdoms of natural history, botany, and climatology to such an extent that herein we find mild winters, vigorous grasses, even in mid-winter, that enable stock to be grazed upon the hills, and gives a facility for travel during the severest seasons of the year."

This remarkable meteorological condition is accounted for by the fact of the existence of an "infinite number of hot springs at the headwaters of the Missouri, Columbia, and Yellowstone rivers," and hot geysers similar to those in California at the head of the Yellowstone, together with the peculiar conformation of the Wind River mountains, and other mountain chains in that region, which "stand as a curvilinear wall to deflect and direct the currents of atmosphere which sweep across the continent. (By the bye, whence arises the name of the Wind River chain?) All their slopes are well located to reflect back the direct rays of the heat of the sun to the valleys that lie at their base. These valleys, already warm by virtue of the hot springs existing among them, receive this accumulative heat, which, driven by the new currents of cold air from the Plains, rises and moves onward, in the form of a river, toward the valleys of the Rocky mountains, where it joins the milder currents from the Pacific, and diffuses over the whole country a mild, healthy, invigorating, and useful climate."

Mr. Philip Ritz, a gentleman who resides in Washington Territory, and who is represented to be entirely reliable, informs us that he has passed over this part of the mountains at various times in midwinter, and "so free from snow are these passes, from the effects of the wind currents coming from the great plains of the Columbia and the Pacific ocean, that I (he) found no difficulty in crossing at any time." He adds:

"The most surprising feature of the country is the small amount of snow that falls, and the fact that cattle winter here and keep fat on the natural pastures. Mr. T. M. McCoy wintered two hundred head within a few miles of the summit without any food whatever except what they had by grazing on the dry grass."

He states further:

"That there never has been a winter, with all their horses and men, and stations ten and twelve miles apart, on the Central route, that the Overland Company have carried the mail through on time; while on this route, from Hell Gate to Walla Walla, a distance of four hundred miles, and that a new route, with stations in places fifty miles apart, Messrs. Clark and Witchee carried the mail on horseback; and not only carried it through every trip, semi-weekly, during last winter, but were never once behind schedule time."

Governor Stevens says:

"In the winter of 1854-55 the Flathead Indians passed through these passes in January, February, and March; whole tribes, with their women and children, and their pack animals laden down with meat and furs."

Victor, head chief of the Flathead nation, states that—

"Since the memory of the Indian they had passed these mountains year after year through the winter months, the sole trouble being that there were some places where the snow was deep enough to cover up the grass; but in those places it was in the wooded portions, and two and a half feet was the greatest depth."

From Fort Benton eastward the climate is somewhat more severe than on the western portions of the route. The coldest weather, however, and the deepest snows to be found on any part of the route are in my own State, where it is well known they do not interpose any serious obstacles to the working of railroads.

"The mean winter temperature of Fort Benton in 1853-54 was 25° 33' above zero. At Montreal, on the Grand Trunk railroad, for the same year, it was 13° 22', and for a mean of ten years 17° 30' above zero. On the great Russian railroad from St. Petersburg to Moscow the comparison is similar. For a series of twenty-one years at Moscow the mean winter temperature was 15° 20', and at St. Petersburg, for the same time, the mean was 18° 10' above zero. At Fort Snelling, in Minnesota, the mean winter temperature of 1853-54 was 11° 46', and the mean of thirty-five winters was 16° 10' above zero. Thus in the remarkably cold winter of 1853-54 Fort Benton was 15° warmer than Montreal, 11° warmer than Fort Snelling, 10° warmer than Moscow, and 7° warmer than St. Petersburg."

The fact that railroads are operated without serious obstruction from cold and snow at Montreal, Moscow, and Fort Snelling is sufficient evidence that no difficulty will be encountered in the much warmer climate of Fort Benton.

"At Fort Benton and Fort Campbell, on the Upper Missouri, ever since they were established, some twenty-five years ago, the fur companies have taken their goods to their winter trading posts on the Milk and Marias rivers in wagons, there not being snow enough for sleds."—Letter of Governor Stevens, April 30, 1860.

Professor Hind, in an official report to the Canadian Legislature, says:

"That at the Red River settlement the mean winter temperature in 1856-57 was 6° 35' above zero, and the total fall of snow for that year was 39.5 inches, when for the same year the fall of snow in Toronto, Canada, was 72.9 inches.

"The prevailing character of the winter months at this point are long continued intense cold, with a clear, dry atmosphere." * * * "The half-breeds, and of course the Indians, camp out in the open plain during the whole winter, and the only protection they enjoy consists of a buffalo-skin tent and an abundance of buffalo robes."

Rev. John West, late chaplain to the Hudson Bay Company, remarks of the winter at the Red River settlement:

"The winter is nearly the same, as to the time it sets in and breaks up, as that of Montreal, but the frost is rather more intense, with less snow and a clearer air."—West's Journal, p. 114.

The Red River settlement thus described lies more than two hundred miles north of the line of this road and a thousand miles east of the mountain passes just mentioned, and is entirely beyond the reach of the peculiar meteorological influences which produce such remarkable effects there.

By Blodgett's rain maps it is shown that from St. Paul, Minnesota, to the Rocky mountains the total annual fall of snow averages only about twenty inches. In Canada the average is fifty inches. In New England, from seventy inches in the interior to one hundred inches on the sea-board.

It is therefore obvious that neither the cold nor snows of the Northern route interpose any obstacles to the construction or successful operation of the road. Indeed, the snows are much deeper, and the cold more intense on the elevated portions of the Central route than on the Northern, owing to the fact that the country about the headwaters of the Missouri and the Clark's branch of the Columbia is so much lower and the air so much dryer than in the passes of the Sierra Nevada and Rocky mountains selected for the Central route, and to the additional facts that the mountain portions of the Northern route lie so near the Pacific as to be affected by the warm winds from that ocean and by the "river of heat" described by Lieutenant Mullen. The chief engineer of the Union Pacific road confirms this statement of the comparative mildness of the climate on the Northern route, by the declaration, on page 10, of a report made in December, 1867, that the Oregon branch, which he advises his company to construct, "avoids the Wasatch and Sierra Nevada ranges, with their troublesome snows and inhospitable winters."

On Fremont's Peak, in latitude 43°, the limit of perpetual congelation was reached at an elevation of ten thousand feet. A large part of the elevated portions of the Central route is so near this limit as to account for the "troublesome snows" and "inhospitable winters," which it is sought to avoid by a line running further north, but through the warmer depression in the mountains. In fact, the altitude of the Central far more than counterbalances the latitude of the Northern line.

ITS WATER COMMUNICATIONS AND FACILITIES FOR CONSTRUCTION.

Considered with reference to its intermediate water communications, as well as to those at its termini, the Northern route commends itself most forcibly to public favor. Passing westward from the head of Lake Superior it crosses the Mississippi river at or near St. Cloud, Minnesota. Next it strikes the Red river of the North, connecting with the navigation upon it, and thereby with Lake Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan and Assinaboine rivers and their tributaries, making over three thousand miles of navigable waters, and opening to settlement and to our commerce the great northern basin containing over four hundred thousand miles of valuable territory. Thence it continues to the Missouri river, which it reaches at a point four hundred and eighty-five miles distant from the head of Lake Superior. Thence it follows the general direction of the Missouri for a distance of five hundred miles to the Great Falls near Fort Benton, to which point the Missouri is navigable. Thence to the navigable waters on Flathead and Clark's rivers, a distance of two hundred miles. Thence along the navigable waters of the latter river one hundred and seventy-five miles. Thence to Lewis river, at the mouth of the Paluse, one hundred and forty miles, and thence down the valleys of the Lewis and Columbia to Portland.

From this it will be observed that only eight hundred and twenty-five miles of road are necessary to be built at different points in order to make a complete steam route from ocean to ocean. The advantages for construction afforded by these navigable streams cannot be overestimated. No other route presents such engineering facilities, for it can be worked simultaneously from four different divisions, the extremity of each division resting on water lines, and thus the road can move on simultaneously on eight different sections—the longest division being the one from Fort Benton to the Columbia, and the longest distance of road from a single point accessible by water being three hundred miles. On every other route the distance between water lines will be fifteen hundred to two thousand miles. This route follows the timbered valley of the streams nearly the whole distance, thus affording an ample supply of pure water, timber, and fuel. Starting, as it does, from the head of Lake Superior, the iron and other heavy materials for its construction can be brought to its own depot by water, as well as supplied at the various points of intersection of the navigable rivers on its line.

ITS AGRICULTURAL AND MINERAL RESOURCES.

The agricultural resources and mineral wealth of the country along the line of this road are not surpassed, if they are equaled, by any other part of the public domain. John Wilson, Third Auditor of the Treasury, and late Commissioner of the General Land Office, an eminent authority on all questions appertaining to the topography and resources of the country, says:

"The lands along the Northern are all fit for cultivation, and consequently the local business will support the road. In fact it is one of the most beautiful sections of country in the world, and you travel comparatively a short distance west from St. Paul till you feel the influence of the Pacific winds and strike the isothermal line of southern Illinois, and where cattle can pasture the whole year. The mineral wealth along the Northern is almost incalculable."

Governor Isaac I. Stevens, who surveyed the entire route, and spent several years in exploring the country contiguous to it, says:

"In the whole distance from Breckenridge to Seattle, a distance of fifteen hundred and forty-four miles, the route passes through only about three hundred and twenty miles of uncultivated country. East of Breckenridge to St. Paul and Lake Superior the country is exceedingly rich and inviting to the settler."

Lewis and Clarke, under date of May 17, 1805, and while encamped on the Rocky mountains, state in their journal:

"The country along the Rocky mountains, for several hundred miles in length and about fifty wide, is a high level plain, in all its parts extremely fertile. This plain is chiefly interrupted near the streams of water, where the hills are steep and lofty, but the soil is good. Nearly the whole of this widespread tract is covered with a profusion of grass and plants, which are at this time as high as the knees."

Grass and plants as high as the knees on the 17th of May! Gentlemen from New England and the northern parts of the Middle States will please note this date. But the agricultural character of the northern part of our territory is so well known that it is unnecessary to adduce further evidence. There is, however, upon our northern border, a vast territory capable of making eight States the size of New York, the whole of which would be tributary to this road, about which there is less general information, and to which I may briefly refer.

The English explorer, Hind, writes of this country:

"Of the valley of the Red river I find it impossible to speak in any other terms than those which may express astonishment and admiration. I entirely concur in the brief but expressive description given to me by an English settler on the Assinaboine, that the valley of the Red river, including a large portion belonging to its great affluents, is a paradise of fertility." "The Saskatchewan, which gathers its waters from a country greater in extent than the vast region drained by the St. Lawrence and all its tributaries from Lake Superior to the Gulf, is navigable by either the north or south branch for more than a thousand miles of its course. So mild is the climate on the south branch of this river (two hundred miles north of the line of this road) that the Indians hunt the buffalo on horseback all winter, and so little snow is said to fall that snow-shoes are seldom used. That this extensive territory drained by the Saskatchewan and its tributaries is fit for settlement, in as far as regards climate, is fully proved by the success which attends the farming operations which are carried on, though on a small scale, at the various trading posts, and by the fact that cattle and horses at these establishments are generally left to forage for themselves during the winter. As regards the soil, from what is yet known of the country there is not, perhaps, on the globe so great an extent of country so little broken by barren tracts. Regarding the territory in its general aspect there is not in the universe a finer field for colonization. It has a salubrious climate, and the soil in many places, as at Red river, is unsurpassed for fertility. Iron ore, lead, and salt are to be found in abundance, and the whole territory, from Lake Winnipeg to the base of the Rocky mountains, is intersected by navigable rivers and lakes."

He mentions some specimens of farming on the Assinaboine river, and says that one farmer had "grown fifty-six measured bushels of wheat to the acre. Forty bushels to the acre is a common return on new land. His turnips were magnificent; four of them weighed seventy-two pounds. A portion of the potato crop was still in the ground. They far surpassed in quantity, quality, and size any I had ever seen before. I counted thirteen, fourteen, and sixteen potatoes, averaging three and a half inches in diameter, at each root." "Indian corn, if properly cultivated, and an early variety selected, may always be relied on. The melon grows with the utmost luxuriance without any artificial aid, and ripens perfectly before the end of August."

This fertile district, which is destined at no distant day to be the wheat granary of the world, contains an area of about four hundred thousand square miles, the whole of which will be tributary to the Northern road, as will readily appear upon an examination of the map of that region. The revenues of the road will not only be immensely increased by the commerce of that great country, but its construction within our own territory will prevent any attempt to build one by the British Government, and will guaranty the speedy annexation of British Columbia to the United States without conquest or purchase.

Returning to an investigation of the mineral wealth of the States and Territories on the Northern road, I find it stated by the mining commissioners of the Treasury Department, J. Ross Browne and J. W. Taylor, that the product of gold and silver for the year 1867 was as follows:

Montana.....	$12,000,000
Idaho.....	6,500,000
Washington.....	1,000,000
Oregon.....	2,000,000
	<hr/> $21,500,000

It will be remembered that the Delegates from Montana and Idaho protested from their places on this floor against the order to print J. Ross Browne's report on the ground of the injustice alleged to have been done their Territories by the great undervaluation of the product of gold and silver. The entire product of the precious metals in Oregon and the said Territories since 1862 is estimated as follows:

Montana.....	$65,000,000
Idaho.....	45,000,000
Washington.....	10,000,000
Oregon.....	20,000,000
	<hr/> $140,000,000

All this has been done at enormous cost and great disadvantage. Mining in Montana and Idaho has hardly begun. They are doubtless immensely rich in minerals, but so long as it costs $600 per ton to transport mining machinery there we may not expect a thorough development of this wealth.

But notwithstanding all these advantages of distance, gradients, climate, soil, water communications, and mineral wealth, the question still remains, "Is it safe, expedient, and necessary for Congress to grant the proposed loan of national credit at this time?"

IS IT SAFE?

It is, and for these reasons: the bill provides that the issue of Government bonds shall ipso facto constitute a mortgage upon the road and all its appurtenances; and upon the failure or refusal of the company to pay the interest, or to redeem the bonds or any portion of them when due, the Secretary of the Treasury is to be authorized to take possession of the road, with all the rights, functions, immunities, and appurtenances thereto belonging, and also all the lands granted to said company which at the time of such default shall remain in their ownership, and hold the same for the full indemnity of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury is also required by the Pacific railroad law to retain one half of the compensation for services rendered by the road as a fund for the redemption of the principal of the bonds, and also, as an additional sinking fund, five per cent. on the net earnings of the road. It can be shown conclusively that if the Government should actually donate the entire amount of bonds asked for, and thereby secure the construction of the road, it would be a most profitable investment for the United States; but fortunately the Pacific roads already partially built demonstrate the fact that the Government will never be called upon to pay one dollar for them.

The President of the Kansas Pacific road states officially that—

"The Government is receiving directly into its Treasury from that company more than the interest on all the bonds issued to it, added to a sinking fund that will extinguish the principal at maturity. This is altogether irrespective of the economy arising from the substitution of rail for wagon-road in the transportation of mails, troops, and supplies for the Government."

The Committee on Military Affairs of this House, to whom was referred the letter of Lieutenant General Sherman, dated March 4, 1868, recommending Government aid to extend the Kansas Pacific road, as a "military necessity" and a measure of public economy, reported the following facts and conclusions drawn from official records:

The cost to the Government for transportation on the Union Pacific Railway, Eastern Division, in 1867, was..... $511,906 24

If the military supplies had been wagoned, and the mails carried by stage, and the troops marched, (taking the average rates at which the Government made its transportation contracts for that year, as shown by certificates of the departments of the Quartermaster General and Postmaster General,) the cost would have been..... 1,358,291 02

Saving to the Government in 1867..... $846,382 78

"At this rate of saving," say the committee, "all the United States bonds issued in aid of this road, principal and interest, would be extinguished in less than four years."

It appears, therefore, by this report and from official records, that from the first year's actual business of this unfinished road—its average length being only two hundred and one miles—the company have paid all the interest due on the United States bonds issued to aid it; that they have deposited the necessary sinking fund, and that, in addition, it has saved to the Government in a single year over twenty-five per cent. on the entire amount of aid it has received. It should be borne in mind, also, that this saving will be much greater when the road shall be completed, and that it will not be for a single year, but for all time.

Equally favorable results have been produced by the Union Pacific road, as will appear from the following statement, compiled from the official records of the Quartermaster General's office. In 1866 wagon transportation over the route now occupied by this road cost an average of 28.4 cents per ton per mile; in 1867, an average of 39.4 cents per ton per mile; while for the season from January 1, 1868, to March 31, of the same year, the lowest contract that could be obtained was fifty cents per ton per mile. The cost of Government transportation over this road is 10.5 cents per ton per mile. The amount paid by the Quartermaster General to this railroad in 1867, for Government transportation, was $699,698 81. Had this same freight been transported by wagons at the contract price for that year, 39.4 cents, the cost would have been $2,625,536 41. So that the money actually saved to the Government in one year, with the road in operation an average distance of only three hundred and eighty-seven miles, was $1,925,837 60. This is the actual profit to the Government, for the company has paid into the United States Treasury the full amount of interest due on the bonds received, and also the percentage of sinking fund required by law.

The Central Pacific, I am informed, presents an equally good balance sheet as between the company and the Government, but I have not the official figures at hand. It appears, therefore, that from two of these roads, having an aggregate of only five hundred and eighty-seven miles completed, the Government received a net profit of $2,772,140 42 in one year. The saving made by the Central Pacific will doubtless swell this aggregate net profit to the sum of $3,500,000 for 1867, making an actual net profit large enough to pay in five years the entire amount of Government bonds loaned for the construction of these portions of said roads. The business necessity for all these roads is clearly demonstrated by their extraordinary success while yet in an unfinished condition. I know nothing in the history of railway construction that is at all comparable to it. Nor can we avoid the conclusion that these favorable results to the Government will be largely augmented when the roads shall be completed. Their wonderful success demonstrates also the statement already made, that the Government will never be called upon to pay one dollar for them. The companies owning them will, at no distant day, become among the richest private corporations in the world, and it is by no means probable that they will, by default in payment permit the Government to foreclose her mortgages and take possession of this immensely valuable and productive property for one third of its cost. If they should do so even that would be a transaction by which the nation would gain many million dollars. The same reasons which insure the safety of the Government in regard to the roads just referred to apply with equal if not greater force (as we shall hereafter see) to the Northern Pacific. The amount of the loan asked for is about fifty million dollars, which is to be a second mortgage, the first being for the same amount.

Mr. Edwin F. Johnson, chief engineer of the road, and one of the safest, most reliable, and intelligent engineers in the country, officially estimates the entire cost of construction and equipment at $156,847,500. That he has probably not overestimated this cost will appear from the letter of the Secretary of War in answer to the Senate's resolution of July 24, 1866, in which he transmitted to the Senate reports from A. A. Humphreys, chief of engineers, and General J. H. Simpson, lieutenant colonel of engineers. The former officially estimates the entire cost of construction and equipment at $215,806,208; the latter estimates it at $206,600,840.

Hence, though the Government shall take a second lien, it is rendered secure by the fact that the company will have to expend of their own money from fifty to a hundred million dollars in addition to the amount of the liens of the first mortgage bondholders and of the Government, which amount thus to be expended by the company will be subsequent to the lien of the United States. It is, therefore, a transaction which, on the part of the Government, is absolutely safe.

IS IT EXPEDIENT UNDER EXISTING CIRCUMSTANCES?

When I entered upon the investigation of this subject the questions that arose in my mind were: "Are we as a nation sufficiently careful and discreet?" "Are we not in danger of going too fast?" "May we not be overconfident of our powers, and too ready to undertake great and costly enterprises, from which older and more experienced peoples, with so heavy a burden of debt, would shrink?" With these conservative queries in mind I began the comparison of the United States with Great Britain and France, in order that I might profit by the wisdom of the statesmen who control the destinies of those great nations. I earnestly solicit the attention of the House to a statement of the results of that comparison.

Since 1860 Great Britain has aided the construction of forty-six hundred miles of railroad in India, at an estimated expense of $440,000,000, for which sum the credit of the imperial Government was granted to private companies, guaranteeing five per cent. interest on all money invested in Indian railroads. The public debt of Great Britain in 1863, at the time she was thus loaning her credit for the construction of said roads, was $3,915,000,000, and her population a little less than thirty millions, making a debt to each person of $130 40. I speak, of course, of Great Britain proper, for it is well known that her dependencies are not sources of any considerable net revenue.

The standing army of Great Britain, in 1863, on a "peace establishment," was 108,518 officers and men and 27,331 horses. The current expenses of the British Government that year were about the average of other years of peace, and amounted, when reduced to the basis of our currency, to $460,000,000.

Within the last ten years France, also, has loaned her credit for the construction of railroads to the amount of $620,000,000, which was authorized to be raised by private companies by debentures, "on which the Government guaranteed four per cent. interest, and sixty-five hundredths sinking fund, for the paying them off in fifty years." The public debt of France in 1862 was $2,206,000,000, and her population 37,000,000, making a debt to each person of $59 65. The standing army of France, as estimated for in 1863 was, "peace establishment," 404,195 men and 86,368 horses; "war establishment," 757,725 men and 143,238 horses. The current expenses of the French Government for that year, on a peace basis were, when reduced to the standard of our currency, $515,900,000.

The public debt of the United States, as officially reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, was on the 1st of September, 1868, $2,535,614,813, and our population is about forty millions, giving, as the indebtedness of each person, sixty-three dollars. The standing Army of the United States does not exceed, I believe, forty thousand men, and our current expenses, including payment of interest on debt, are within $350,000,000 per annum. Our Army, therefore, is only about one fifth as large as that of Great Britain and less than one tenth that of France. The expenses of Great Britain exceed ours by $119,000,000 per annum; those of France are greater than ours by $165,000,000 per annum. Consider, now, the probable resources of these three great nations, on which the future may rely to meet their financial burdens. Their past increase in population and in wealth will furnish the surest guide to a safe estimate for the future. On this point I submit a table showing the actual increase in population of the United States by decades from 1790 to 1860; of Great Britain from 1793 to 1861; of France from 1801 to 1861:

1861.....	-	29,334,788	37,400,000

Increase in the United States for seventy years, 700.41 per cent.

Increase in Great Britain for sixty-eight years, 102.30 per cent.

Increase in France for sixty years, 37 per cent.

It will be observed that the percentage of gain by the United States over Great Britain and France has been very much greater during the latter decades than during those at the beginning of the century. For instance, from 1800 to 1810 this increase in the United States was thirty-six per cent., while from 1800 to 1812 the increase in Great Britain was twelve per cent., the percentage of gain in the former being three times as great as in the latter nation.

The increase in the United States from 1850 to 1860 was thirty-five per cent., and in Great Britain for the same period it was only seventy-one hundredths per cent., making a percentage of gain in the United States for that decade fifty times greater than in Great Britain.

This comparison will disclose still more remarkable results as between the United States and France, but my time will not permit its further extension.

I beg the attention of the House to another table showing the estimated increase in wealth in the United States by decades, from 1790 to 1860, and the estimated increase in Great Britain at various periods from 1793 to 1860, compiled from the Annual Record for 1861:

(*) Joseph Lowe. (†) Sir W. Patteney. (‡) Colquhoun. (||) Joseph Lowe. (§) Pebrer. (¶) G. R. Porter.

In my printed remarks I will annex to each estimate of the wealth of Great Britain the name of the statistician upon whose authority it is stated. You will observe that during the period of twenty-five years, from 1833 to 1858, the increase in Great Britain was sixty-six per cent.; and in the twenty years from 1840 to 1860 the increase in the United States was over three hundred and thirty per cent. From 1800 to 1858 (fifty-eight years) Great Britain's increase was two hundred and thirty-three per cent., while from 1800 to 1860 (sixty years) this nation's increase was fourteen hundred per cent. During the forty years from 1793 to 1833 the increase of wealth in Great Britain was one hundred and fifty-one per cent. During substantially the same period, namely, from 1790 to 1830, the United States' increase of wealth was two hundred and fifty-three per cent. From 1833 to 1858 Great Britain's increase in wealth was sixty-nine per cent. From 1830 to 1860 (the railroad era) the increase of wealth in the United States was five hundred and eight per cent.

It will be seen that during the first period, including the infancy of our country, when our percentage of increase would be supposed to be greatest, our gain was less than double that of Great Britain; while during the thirty years from 1830 to 1860, since we entered upon railroad development, it has been more than seven times that of Great Britain.

Compare the growth of the two countries in their annual products:

In 1858 the products of Great Britain were $2,917,800,000
In 1833 the products of Great Britain were 2,503,564,248

Increase in twenty-five years..... $414,235,752

Percentage of increase in twenty-five years, seventeen.

In 1860 the products of the United States were $3,804,000,000

In 1840 the products of the United States were 1,063,135,000

Increase of annual products in twenty years..... $2,740,865,000

Percentage of increase during same time, two hundred and fifty-six.

Gain in the value of annual products during this period more than eighteen times greater than in Great Britain.

Take one other period.

In 1800 the value of Great Britain's products was $1,313,000,000, which, deducted from that of 1858, shows an increase in fifty-eight years of $1,604,800,000, or one hundred and twenty-two per cent.

In 1800 the value of the products of the United States was $300,300,000, and in 1860 $3,804,000,000; making an increase in sixty years of $3,504,700,000. Gain during this period nine times greater than in Great Britain.

From a comparison of the gains of these various periods it will be observed that during the later years it has been very much greater relatively in the United States than during the earlier part of the century, thus proving that this vast disparity in our favor is likely to increase rather than diminish in the future.

The relative ability of the two nations to bear their respective burdens may be seen in the light of another fact. When our war ended, three and a half years ago, the entire debt, liquidated and unliquidated, amounted to over $3,300,000,000; and on the 1st of last September it was only, in round numbers, $2,500,000,000—a reduction by actual payment in three and a half years of $800,000,000. In 1816 the debt of Great Britain was $4,200,000,000; and in 1863 it was, in round numbers, $3,900,000,000—a reduction of only $300,000,000 in forty-seven years.

I have not the data nor the time to extend these comparisons as to increase of wealth to France, but they would not, I think, be very dissimilar from those just made between the United States and Great Britain.

I have presented these somewhat voluminous statistics for the purpose of showing that we are far more able than either Great Britain or France to pay the debt resting upon us, and to incur such further liabilities as may seem necessary for the development of our country, and also for the purpose of introducing the example of those old conservative nations to refute the arguments of those who say "Now is not the time; we are too much in debt to undertake any of these great enterprises."

Great Britain, with a debt much larger than ours; with a smaller population; with a far less ratio of increase in population, wealth, and annual products; with a standing army at least five times as great as ours to support, loans her credit to the amount of $440,000,000 to build four thousand six hundred miles of railroad for the purpose of developing one of her remote dependencies; and yet we pause and question our ability when it is proposed to loan the credit of our Government to the extent of only about fifty millions, in order to insure the construction of two thousand miles more of railroad, which will develop in the very heart of the great Republic the incalculable wealth that now lies but half concealed in its vast prairies and mountains. If it be prudent for Great Britain to do so much for far-distant India; if France, with a debt almost as large as ours, with a population that in sixty years has increased only one-twentieth as rapidly as ours, with a standing army of from four hundred thousand to seven hundred and fifty thousand men to support—if France, under these circumstances, acts wisely in granting her credit to the extent of $620,000,000 in order to develop the resources of a country not larger than one of our States, shall it be said that we are injudicious and reckless of the nation's credit when we propose a loan of only about fifty million dollars to open up a great highway for the world's commerce and to develop the wealth of five hundred thousand square miles of the richest mineral and agricultural territory on the globe?

Why, sir, since I began the investigation of this question I have been astonished to find that with incalculably greater inducements to engage in these giant enterprises of the century we are far behind the other nations in the encouragement given to them. Young America is really old foggyish on this point. The wise statesmen of the Old World see that in the full development of their national resources consists the ability to meet their national obligations. Shall we profit by their example?

IS IT NECESSARY AT THIS TIME?

It is for several reasons.

1. The road is a "military necessity." All our efforts thus far to secure permanent peace with the Indian tribes have proved disastrous and costly failures. The treaty system has been tried until its palpable absurdities are apparent. Treaties have been so often violated by both parties that the Indian, at least, has come to regard them as binding only so long as necessity or self-interest compels obedience. Without stopping now to ask which party is most at fault, I will content myself with the assertion of the fact so often demonstrated within the last twenty years, that lasting peace cannot be obtained by the treaty system.

Can it be secured by war? Not with the facilities we now have for conducting such wars. It is often said that the Indians should be turned over to the War Department and annihilated if they will not cease their outrages. It is not difficult to turn them over by law to the military authorities, but for the military authorities to get possession of their property is quite another matter. Catching the hare is in order before eating him. And as to the proposition to "annihilate them," often so glibly uttered, it will when tried be far more likely to annihilate the Treasury than the Indians. I hold in my hand a report from the Secretary of War, dated December 30, 1866, which states that the attempt to suppress Indian hostilities in 1864 and 1865 cost $30,580,942 93. An estimate, made at the time, of the number of Indians killed by those expeditions showed about one dead Indian for every $2,000,000 expended. At that rate of expenditure the "annihilation" of two thousand Indians will cost as much as the suppression of the rebellion.

The Indian war expenses of 1864 and 1865 certainly did not exceed, if they equalled, the average expenses for that purpose during the last six years. For several months in 1866 the cost (as stated by General Grant) was about one million dollars per week. The total expenditure, therefore, for Indian wars during the last six years will doubtless largely exceed $100,000,000.

For all this vast expenditure what has been done toward securing a permanent peace? Absolutely nothing. The savages are far more turbulent and troublesome than they were six years ago. Our dispatches from the plains are still burdened with accounts of all sorts of plundering, mail-robbing, scalping, and murdering. For every Indian killed a dozen soldiers have been sacrificed. The experiences of the last six years, therefore, are not such as to justify a very strong confidence in the "annihilation" or even in the thorough chastisement of the savage by our present mode of warfare. I believe in punishing him when he does wrong, and I am entirely satisfied that in no other way can we have peace. He regards no compact that he does not fear to break. He knows no law but the law of force. He respects no authority but that in which he sees the power to enforce obedience.

It is no fault of the Army, or of the generals in command, that we have so utterly failed. The Army is a portion of the same that won imperishable glory on the bloody fields of the South. The commanders are among those most renowned for tact, dash, and energy. The names of Sherman, Sheridan, and Hancock, are a sufficient guarantee that nothing within the range of possibilities has been left undone. Why, then, have we so signally failed? The answer is found in the inherent difficulty of the situation, namely, the impossibility of "getting at" the foe. Infantry are worse than useless. Cavalry scour the plains for a few hundred miles from headquarters, but do not find the enemy. A million and a half square miles of unsettled prairie and mountain fastnesses offer him a sure and safe retreat. A score of these wild horsemen of the plains, accustomed to subsist by the chase, and mounted on their fleet ponies, with no baggage but a gun and blanket, with no tents to pitch and no base of supplies to guard, can bid defiance to whole regiments of cavalry. The Indian system of warfare is to divide into small predatory bands, strike a blow at some defenseless frontier settlement, plunder and murder some emigrant train, or rob the United States mail, and before our troops are aware of their outrages they are hundreds of miles away in the interior, or at some other remote quarter, committing new depredations. It is this immunity from danger, this certain and ever open door of escape from punishment, that makes the Indian so troublesome; and it is the impossibility of finding him that makes all our military expeditions such utter failures.

So long as he has behind him this vast unoccupied territory, into which he can flee and be safe, the Government will be powerless to enforce his obedience, and will continue to squander untold millions in fruitless efforts to conquer a peace. What, then, is the remedy? There is but one—the construction of railroads across the continent, whereby troops can be speedily moved, and self-protecting settlements be made.

All of our generals who have commanded in the Indian country, and whose opinions are most valuable on this subject, agree that this is the true solution of the "Indian question."

In his report as Secretary of War ad interim, General Grant says:

"During the last summer and summer before I caused inspection to be made of the various routes of travel and supply through the territory between the Missouri river and the Pacific coast: the cost of maintaining troops in that section was so enormous that I desired, if possible, to reduce it. This I have been enabled to do, to some extent, from the information obtained from these inspectors; but, for the present, the military establishment between the lines designated must be maintained at a great cost per man. The completion of the railroad to the Pacific will materially reduce this cost, as well as the number of men to be kept there. The completion of those roads will also go far toward a permanent settlement of our Indian affairs."

On the 4th of March, 1868, Lieutenant General Sherman, writing in regard to the Kansas Pacific road, says:

"This road is a military necessity, and will very much stimulate the settlement of that region of our public domain."

Major General Sheridan wrote, on the 2d of May, 1868, concerning the same road, as follows:

"I know that pecuniarily it will be to the advantage of the Government to help this road."

"But, in addition, it almost substantially ends our Indian troubles by the moral effect which it exercises over the Indians, and the facility which it gives to the military in controlling them."

"No one, unless he has personally visited this country, can well appreciate the great assistance which this railroad gives to economy, security, and effectiveness in the administration of military affairs in this department."

Major General Hancock, under date of June 4, 1868, says:

"From my personal experience, obtained while I was on the plains, with respect to the transportation of troops and supplies by the railroad in question, (the Union Pacific, Eastern Division,) as well as its great importance in connection with the settlement of the country, I feel that I can speak in strong language as to the necessity of this road being extended as rapidly as practicable to Fort Wallace, where I have lately been."

Major General Sanborn, a member of the peace commission, and a gentleman of large experience in Indian affairs, on the 31st of October last wrote:

"Railroads, more than all other things, extend our civilization over near and remote regions, and will do more in a single decade to civilize Indians, and to compel them to abandon nomadic habits, than could be done in a century without them. The members of the commission, so far as I know, are all advocates of two more lines of road to the Pacific."

Precisely the same reasons on which these eminent generals base their recommendations of aid to the Kansas Pacific road, as a "military necessity," apply with equal or greater force to the Northern Pacific. Between the forty-fourth degree of north latitude (a line about half way from the central to the northern routes) and our northern boundary there resides over one hundred thousand Indians, being one third of the entire Indian population of the West. Of this number thirty-five thousand are Sioux, confessedly the most warlike and dangerous of all the tribes. Some fifty thousand more belong to the Oregon, Washington, Montana, and Idaho tribes, with many of whom we have been in a state of chronic warfare for years. In British America, adjacent to our northern boundary, are thirty-five thousand more, who, in the event of war, readily cross the line and join the tribes on this side.

Now, including British America, there is a vast, unoccupied country north of the line of the Union and Central Pacific roads at least a thousand miles in width by twelve hundred miles in length into which, when pursued, the savage can retreat. Twelve hundred thousand miles of prairie, wilderness, and mountain solitude for a place of refuge! Surely he can desire no more certain immunity from punishment.

So far as these warlike northern tribes are concerned, the construction of only one road across the continent will have the effect to irritate without furnishing the means to control them.

They will sweep down upon the line of the Union Pacific, murder and scalp a train of passengers, and escape unharmed to their northern refuge, where it will still be almost as impossible to "get at" them as it is now. The cheapest, and in fact the only way to protect the road now nearly finished, will be to construct two more. Complete the Central, Northern, and Southern roads, and three lines of settlements, not more than from four hundred to six hundred miles apart, will span the continent. Towns and cities capable of self-protection will spring up at convenient distances; troops can be speedily transported and cheaply subsisted. War may then be made effective, if war shall be necessary. But the fact that it can be effective will be apparent to the Indian and will soon teach him that in obedience is his only safety. He will then peaceably submit to the only law he recognizes—the law of force—and our Indian wars will be "substantially ended."

2. It is necessary as a measure of retrenchment.

In the words of General Grant, "The construction of a road by the proposed route would be of very great advantage to the Government pecuniarily."

But I can present no argument on this point half so forcible as the quotation of the entire letter of that far-seeing statesman and great soldier:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 20, 1866.

The construction of a railroad by the proposed route would be of very great advantage to the Government pecuniarily, by saving the cost of transportation to supply troops, whose presence in the country through which it is proposed to pass is made necessary by the great amount of emigration to the gold-bearing regions of the Rocky mountains. In my opinion, too, the United States would receive an additional pecuniary benefit in the construction of this road by the settlement it would induce along the line of the road, and consequently the less number of troops necessary to secure order and safety. How far these benefits should be compensated by the General Government beyond the grant of land already awarded by Congress I would not pretend to say. I would merely give it as my opinion that the enterprise of constructing the Northern Pacific railroad is one well worth fostering by the General Government, and that such aid could well be afforded as would insure the early prosecution of the work.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

Aside from the testimony of this eminent authority the facts will demonstrate that the prompt construction of the Northern Pacific road is a necessary measure of retrenchment. We have just seen that the cost of our fruitless Indian wars has reached the enormous sum of $100,000,000 in six years. The papers inform us that Mr. A. H. Jackson, of New York city, has compiled from the official records and will soon publish an exhibit of the cost of the several Indian wars during the last thirty-seven years, which will show the loss of over twenty thousand lives, and an expenditure of more than seven hundred and fifty million dollars, making an average annual loss during that time of more than six hundred soldiers and $20,000,000. I have not been able to make a minute personal examination of these records, but having been chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs for six years I have given much attention to this subject, and I am satisfied Mr. Jackson's statement is not an exaggeration. But in order that I may be indisputably within the bounds of truth I will place the estimate of expense in this regard at the average of $15,000,000 per annum for the last thirty-seven years.

The highest military authorities of the nation have unanimously advised us that in our Pacific railroad system will be found the peaceful solution of the "Indian question." In the words of General Grant, in his official report as Secretary of War ad interim, "the completion of these roads will go far toward a permanent settlement of the Indian question," or, in the still more emphatic language of General Sheridan, just quoted, they will "almost substantially end our Indian troubles." Says General Ingalls:

"Nothing would so much conduce to the settlement of the difficulties with the Indian tribes as the facilities afforded by railroads for a speedy communication through this country. In my opinion, from an experience of many years in the quartermaster's department in the West and Northwest, it is of the utmost importance to the nation that this road (the Northern Pacific) should be constructed at the earliest moment possible."—Extract from letter dated April 25, 1866.

In April, 1866, Quartermaster General Meigs wrote of the Northern Pacific road:

"The enterprise is one worthy of the nation. As a military measure, contributing to national security and defense alone, it is worthy the cost of effectual assistance by the Government."

The entire Indian population of the West numbers about three hundred thousand, one third of whom, as already stated, reside north of latitude 44°. As to the comparative expense of wars against them and the southern and central tribes, I request the Clerk to read from an official report of the quartermaster general, in response to a resolution offered by myself on the 7th of June, 1866. I have italicized the items which are in whole or in part chargeable to the northern tribes.

Northwestern Indian expedition	$5,236,000
Apaches.....	757,908
Walnut creek.....	73,487
Smoky hill.....	83,341

North Platte.....	213,810
California and Oregon.....	1,018,034
Plum creek.....	80,495
Sand creek.....	182,624
Kiowa.....	311,617
Republican river.....	47,596
New Mexico.....	101,774
Total per year.....	9,110,372

Northwestern expedition	$1,394,190

Districts of the Plains	13,470,957

Republican river.....	30,173
Northwest territory	2,415,168
Total for the two years.....	$28,374,228

Mr. WINDOM. Of the above items those designated, respectively, "northwestern Indian expedition," "northwestern expedition," and "northwest territory," are all, manifestly, for expeditions against the northern tribes. To those items may be added one half of the sums mentioned for California and Oregon, though much the largest part was doubtless expended in the latter State. I add, also, only one third of the item for the "district of the Plains," though the detailed statements of said report will show that this will fall below the actual proportion chargeable to these tribes. It appears, therefore, that of $28,374,228 expended in two years on account of the quartermaster's department, $14,888,268, or more than fifty per cent. of the whole, was for military expeditions against the Indians living north of latitude 44°. I have no official statement of the comparative costs for other years since 1862, but the proportion to be charged to the northern Indians will exceed that for the years mentioned in said report.

It may, therefore, be safely asserted that more than one half of the $100,000,000 expended during the last six years is properly chargeable to the futile efforts against Indians on or near the line of the Northern Pacific road. I will, however, estimate the proportion thus chargeable to them during that time at forty per cent. of the whole. Had the three roads been completed six years ago they would have "substantially ended our Indian troubles," and the proportion of saving that could have been credited to the Northern Pacific would have been at least $40,000,000 during that time, or at the rate of over six million five hundred thousand dollars per annum.

That my estimate of the retrenchment which would have been effected by this road is below the actual amount will conclusively appear by reference to the following facts, substantiated by official records, namely: the number of military posts now established on the line and in the vicinity of this road is twenty-eight. The entire number of troops about 4,500. The amount of supplies necessary for their subsistence is 22,995 tons per annum. The cost of transportation alone of these supplies for the year 1867, under the contracts of that year, estimating the distances as officially stated by the Quartermaster General, was $6,158,972, to which must be added the pay of the soldiers and officers, and other large incidental expenses, which will swell this sum to nearly $8,000,000, making almost one sixth of the entire amount of the Government loan asked for to construct the road.

It is stated, on good authority I believe, that a cavalry force of 5,000 men, under command of General Sheridan, is now moving in pursuit of the Indians. This, including the troops at the various posts, is a larger force than was employed in the summer of 1867, when General Grant estimated the expenses at $1,000,000 per week. Winter is also a far more expensive season than summer for Army movements on the prairies and in the mountains. May we not, therefore, safely estimate the present current expenses of Indian wars at $1,000,000 per week—$144,000 per day? And it must not be forgotten that the money thus expended is a total loss, while in the case of the contemplated railroad aid it is a mere loan of credit requiring no actual outlay. Let it be remembered also that this vast fruitless drain upon the Treasury, ranging from $15,000 to $144,000 per day, as just shown, is to continue indefinitely until the true remedy is applied. Shall we apply it, and thereby lighten the burdens of the people, or, under the false pretense of economy, continue the profligate "penny-wise and pound-foolish policy of the past?"

A very great additional saving, amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars per annum, would be effected by the construction of this road, in mail transportation to and from the northwestern States and Territories.

But one of the most important economical features of this measure may be seen in the facilities it will afford to the people of the Northwest for retrenchment in their business expenses, and in the diversion of labor it will effect, from present unproductive channels into pursuits that will add to the wealth of the nation.

During the year 1865 the aggregate shipments of twenty-seven firms, from the town of Atchison alone, amounted to 21,531,830 pounds of assorted merchandise, requiring for its transportation 4,917 wagons, 7,154 mules, 27,675 oxen, and employing 5,256 men. The total amount of capital invested in wagons, mules, oxen, horses, &c., employed in that trade was over six million dollars. It is the opinion of those best informed upon the subject that this trade has doubled every year since 1865. Add to this the shipments over the plains from all the other points, and what an army of men, horses, wagons, &c., and what a vast amount of capital may, by the construction of railroads, be discharged from this unproductive business, and employed in some pursuit that will increase the wealth of the country!

IT IS A NECESSARY REVENUE MEASURE.

In other words, the national credit and national revenues will be greatly benefited by the construction of the road, and for reasons which will appear from the following considerations:

1. It will stimulate immigration.

One of the chief causes of the wonderful increase of the United States in population and wealth, as already shown, is our unparalleled immigration. There is nothing in the history of nations to which it can be compared. The causes which impel this vast tide of humanity to our shores are of course various, but, next to the attractive principle of universal freedom, the most potent among them is the rapid development of our railroad system. I do not refer alone to the direct influence upon those who come to find work in the actual construction of our roads, but to the indirect and far wider influence exerted upon those who come to make homes for themselves and their children upon our public domain, which railroads open for settlement and bring within reach of markets.

It may be instructive to notice for a moment how immigration has kept pace with railway development in this country:

Decades.	No. of miles of railroad constructed.	No. of immigrants during same time.
From 1820 to 1830.....	41	244,490
From 1830 to 1840.....	2,156	552,000
From 1840 to 1850.....	5,289	1,553,300

Thus it will be seen that prior to the railroad era immigration was very small, and that during the last decade (the period of greatest railway development) immigration correspondingly increased. Since 1863 the average number has been about three hundred thousand per annum. It is not difficult to understand why, in a country like ours, this correspondence between the increase of railways and immigration should exist. Had it not been for the facilities they afford the lands in the vicinity of water communication would have all been occupied, and those at a distance would have been worthless. The immigrant would have had none of the inducements to come here which are now presented to him. In fact, without railroads Chicago and most of the other great cities of the West would be only second-class villages, and Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin would, to a great extent, be Indian hunting-grounds. It is because railroads annihilate the distance between cheap lands and good markets, and thus enable the farmer to dispose readily of his products, that the people of the Old World are so anxious to make homes among us. It is for that reason that among the people of my own State to-day will be found more than a hundred thousand hardy, honest, industrious Germans, Norwegians, and Swedes, who rank among the best farmers of the State.

Of course no mathematical estimate can be made of the money value of these immigrants to our country, but it is usually placed at about one thousand dollars per head. This estimate is based upon the assumption that each free person adds as much to the wealth of the nation as the former slave did to his master—an assumption evidently unjust to the free citizen. But in order that my calculation may be beyond the reach of cavil, I will estimate the money value of each immigrant at only $500, which will give an aggregate increase of national wealth from this source alone of $750,000,000 within the last five years. It is also stated by John A. Kennedy, formerly superintendent of the Castle Garden immigration depot in New York, that "a careful inquiry, extending over a period of seventeen months, gave an average of $100 (almost entirely in coin) as the money property of each man, woman, and child" landed at New York. At this estimate, the amount of gold and silver added to the circulation of this country every year since 1863 is about thirty million dollars, or the enormous sum of $150,000,000 in five years. Add this to the increase just mentioned and we have $900,000,000 as the result of immigration during that time—a sum much greater than the entire estimated wealth of the United States in 1790. Dr. Engel, the Prussian statistician, says:

"Estimated in money, the Prussian State has lost during sixteen years, by an excess of 180,994 emigrants over immigrants, a sum of more than one hundred and eighty million thalers. It must be added that those who are resolved to try their strength abroad are by no means our weakest elements; their continuous stream may be compared to a well-equipped army, which, leaving the country annually, is, after having crossed the frontier, lost to it forever."

Says Dr. Engel:

"A ship loaded with emigrants is often looked upon as an object of compassion; it is, nevertheless, in a politico-economical point of view, generally more valuable than the richest cargo of gold dust."

What Prussia has thus lost we have gained. But why will the Northern Pacific railroad prove peculiarly valuable in stimulating immigration? First, because it will open to settlement the best portion of the public domain; second, because it will influence the best class of immigrants, by offering them the kind of lands they want, and in the climate they prefer. This human tide which sets toward our shores instinctively follows its own parallels of latitude. That part of Europe which lies north of the forty-eighth degree of north latitude has furnished, probably, four fifths of the foreign population now in the United States, and very much the greater part of that population came from Norway, Sweden, Prussia, and other parts of northern Germany, all of which countries lie north of latitude fifty degrees.

An immigrant from Spain, Portugal, Turkey, Italy, or any of the countries south of the forty-eighth degree would be a curiosity to the people of the Northwest, except that they may have occasionally made the acquaintance of some gentleman from the latter country, as he plied the enterprising avocation of "organ grinder." The intelligence, the energy, the thrift, the money, and the progress, all come from northern Europe, and from a parallel of latitude further north than the line of this road. The census reports show, also, that but few of this class of immigrants seek the southern portions of the United States. The construction of this road will open up a vast extent of fertile territory, which, in climate and natural productions, exactly meets the wants of the populations of northern Europe, and hence it will exert a most powerful influence upon them. Let the Northern Pacific railway and the homestead law march hand in hand across the continent, and in less than a decade you will see along its line at least two millions of the hardy farmers, miners, and mechanics of northern Europe, in whom alone the Government will find an increase of wealth a hundredfold greater than the cost of the road, and who will bring with them enough gold and silver to pay five times over the amount of the proposed loan. If the United States are to advance in wealth in the future as they have done in the past, we must keep wide open the doors to those people who bring with them, and who dig from our soil, so large a proportion of this wealth. And as no other road can, for the obvious reasons just named, supply the inducements to immigration which will be afforded by the Northern Pacific, it seems to me that this alone is conclusive as to the merits of its claim for aid.

2. It will be the means of developing our agricultural and mineral resources.

We are sometimes told that "this is doubtless a meritorious and beneficent enterprise, but the Government cannot afford to aid it because of our immense national debt." We have already seen what other nations similarly situated have done, and how the results have demonstrated their wisdom. Let us now examine this objection by the light of the facts alone, unbiased by their example.

It is true our debt is large, but our resources are also immense. The true way to pay the former is to develop the latter.

The farmer who should refuse to incur the expense of plowing and sowing his fields because he is in debt would be voted an idiot by all his neighbors. Wherein does he differ from the statesman who, aware of the inexhaustible wealth of our soil and of the countless treasures that crop out on almost every mountain side, can yet refuse on grounds of economy (?) the perfectly safe loan of Government credit to the comparatively small extent necessary to develop that wealth and gather up and appropriate to the public benefit those treasures?

The public debt of a nation is great or small according to the proportion it bears to the public wealth. A debt that would have crushed the United States in 1800 would not be felt to-day. Hence, in the exact proportion that our wealth increases our debt diminishes. For instance, in 1840 the entire national wealth was valued at $3,764,000,000. At the close of the rebellion the national indebtedness reached over thirty-three hundred millions. Hence, to have paid the debt of 1865 twenty-eight years ago would have required ninety per cent. of all the property, real, personal, and mixed, in the country. In September, 1868, our debt was $2,585,614,818; and according to the most reliable estimates the wealth of the nation had reached $30,000,000,000. While, therefore, the debt of 1865 would have consumed almost the entire property, public and private, owned by the nation in 1840, the payment of the debt of 1868 would require only about eight per cent. of its present wealth. It is therefore apparent that the burden of the debt of 1868 is only about one-twelfth as great on our present property as the debt of 1865 would have been on the property of 1840. Prospecting the future by a just analogy with the past, let us see what will be the relative burden of our debt in the year 1900, on the assumption that the actual amount of the debt remains unchanged, and that the ratio of increase in wealth shall continue as great hereafter as it was from 1850 to 1860. The ratio of increase during that decade was one hundred and twenty-six and forty-five hundredths per cent. I will assume, however, that the decennial increase will be only one hundred per cent., and the following table will express the result:

	National wealth.	Percentage of debt to property.
1870.....	32,318,000,000	7.84
1880.....	64,636,000,000	3.92
1890.....	129,272,000,000	1.96
1900.....	258,544,000,000	.98

For the data of this table I am indebted to Hon. D. A. Wells, who shows by a document published in 1864 that it is by no means an unreasonable estimate of our prospective wealth.

I think no one can reasonably doubt that our national capacity for growth in the future is quite equal to what it has been, and that with wise statesmanship we may confidently expect to realize the increase just estimated. It will, therefore, be seen that in 1900 our debt will be only one eighth as great a burden as it is now, or only about one ninetieth what it would have been on the property of 1840. In 1900 a tax of only one per cent. will wipe out the entire indebtedness, while now it requires one per cent. to pay the current annual expenses of the Government. Is it not, therefore, clear that the burden of debt diminishes in exactly the same ratio as the wealth of the nation increases?

Let us now inquire more particularly how we shall best promote this increase of wealth, and thereby strengthen the public credit and reduce the public burdens. What has been the chief cause of this wonderful increase heretofore? Let facts and figures answer. A reference to the table of property already submitted will show that the decennial increase of wealth from 1800 to 1840 averaged only about thirty-six and seven tenths per cent., while for the next decade it suddenly ran up to eighty-nine and six tenths per cent., and for the last one, from 1850 to 1860, it sprang forward to one hundred and twenty-six and forty-five hundredths per cent. The secret of this great increase in the ratio may be found in the fact that the last two decades were the periods of railroad construction.

The relative growth in wealth with the increase in railroads is shown in the following statement:

Time.	Miles constructed.	Increase of wealth.	Increase of wealth per mile of road.
From 1830 to 1840.....	2,818	$1,111,000,000	$390,000

The entire accumulation of national wealth for two hundred years, from the settlement of the country down to 1830, (when the first railroad was opened,) was estimated at only $2,653,000,000. From 1830 to 1860, there were constructed thirty thousand six hundred and thirty-five miles of railroad in the United States, and during that period our national wealth was increased to $16,159,000,000. Thus it appears that during the thirty years of railroad development there has been added to the nation's wealth an amount more than six times as great as the entire accumulations of the two hundred years prior to the inauguration of this wonderful engine of progress. In other words, the average annual increase of wealth prior to 1880 was only about thirteen million two hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars. The average annual increase from 1850 to 1880, the period of greatest railroad development, was $902,822,000, showing an average annual increase sixty-eight hundred per cent. greater during the last railroad decade than before 1830. Such astounding results might seem to belong to the domain of fiction were not their correctness demonstrated by the dry and incontrovertible logic of the census tables.

A little reflection will disclose the secret of this wonderful influence of railroads upon our national prosperity. The chief bases of wealth in this country are lands, mines, labor. Separated they are each of little value. Combined they produce the astonishing results we have seen. Railroads afford the only means of combining them successfully, and hence to railroads must these results be mainly attributed. Without them neither lands nor mines can be adequately supplied with labor, nor labor with a market. They are, therefore, the true philosopher's stone, which turns our mountains and prairies into gold.

In a very able work, entitled "Manual of Railroads of the United States," by Henry V. Poor, of New York city—a work, by the way, which should be in the hands of every railroad man and political economist in the country—I find this statement:

"The cost of transporting wheat for three hundred miles over ordinary highways will equal its average value at the point of consumption. Indian corn will bear transportation over earth roads only about one hundred miles."

Hence all the land outside of a radius of three hundred miles from the sea-board or river markets, would be, without railroads or canals, wholly worthless for the purposes of agriculture, and that which lies within such radius would depreciate in value, just in proportion as it approximated that verge of worthlessness. Take a map of the United States, and with scale and dividers mark out those little circles of trade which the wagon-roads would accommodate, and then compare them with the present vast sweep of commerce on this continent, and you will be able to understand why the augmentation of national wealth bears so remarkable a relation to the increase of railroads. Strike from our great cities the support of those vast fertile empires that lie outside of the earth-road radius, and from the prairies and rich valleys of the West take away the markets that are more than three hundred miles distant, and ruin, utter, hopeless ruin, will brood over almost every hearthstone in the land, and national bankruptcy will stare grimly from the steps of the Treasury Department. The same causes which have thus strengthened our national credit and augmented the public revenues will continue, if properly encouraged, to produce similar results. Whether aided by the Government or not the necessities of trade will eventually compel the construction of the road I advocate; but the cost is so great that private capital will hesitate to undertake it, and years will elapse before it will be done. It is only a question of time, it is true; but that question is an all-important one to the nation. It is a question whether we, who are now burdened with debt, shall take means to decrease that burden at once, and let the present generation reap the advantages that are so sure to result from the consummation of this great enterprise, or by a false economy refuse and postpone the incalculable benefits that court our acceptance.

Consider for a moment what will be the effect of the construction of this particular road upon the credit and revenues of the country, by the development of the lands and mines in its vicinity. Take Montana as an illustration. So rich are the mines of that new Territory that since 1862 the population has increased from a few hundreds to sixty thousand, and towns of from four thousand to ten thousand inhabitants have sprung into existence. Its gold and silver products alone are estimated at $65,000,000 in six years. Observe under what disadvantages, and at what ruinous cost, this great addition has been made to the coin of the country. In 1867 twelve thousand tons of freight were delivered in Montana from various distant points, on which the freight and insurance charges averaged twenty-five cents per pound, amounting in the aggregate to $6,000,000. This, in addition to the heavy expenses of travel to and from the Territory, and the loss of the use of capital for many months in the year by merchants and other business men, while goods are in transit, may enable us to form some conception of the burdens borne, for want of railroads, by those who open our mines and lay the foundations of States. The above statement of the cost of transportation is confirmed by Quartermaster General Meigs, who, under date of April, 1866, wrote:

"From St. Louis to Helena, a town of four thousand inhabitants, which has sprung into being in Montana within the past year, the estimated cost of transportation of freight by river and wagon trail is five hundred to six hundred dollars per ton."

And he adds:

"How much must these enormous rates interfere with the opening and development of the rich mining, grazing, and agricultural regions of this Switzerland of America."

Is it unreasonable to assume that with the reduced transportation and cheap labor this road will furnish the gold and silver products of that Territory will be quadrupled, and that, instead of $12,000,000, as reported by J. Ross Browne for 1867, we shall have an annual production of at least $50,000,000?

The estimate for Idaho by the Government commissioners was, for 1867, $6,500,000. This has been produced under disadvantages as great as in Montana. Her products would doubtless show as great an increase by the construction of the road and the facilities it would afford. We may, therefore, I think, safely estimate the increase in gold and silver along the line of the road, which will result from its construction, at $50,000,000 per annum. Give to those people in Montana and Idaho (who, with freight at $600 per ton, have produced $20,000,000 of gold and silver per annum) reasonable facilities for the transportation of heavy mining machinery, cheapen labor and food by opening up easy access to the mining regions, and the next ten years will witness a development of mineral wealth that the most sanguine among us cannot now anticipate. The safe and sure road to specie payment lies in this direction.

According to Redan, the average yearly production of gold and silver in all Europe is $29,024,000. We have seen that in the States and Territories on the line of this road the production in 1867 was over twenty-one million dollars. Are not its resources such as to justify the claim now made for it?

Let my own State illustrate the effect of railroads upon the increase of national wealth by means of the facilities they afford for the settlement and cultivation of public lands. Without railroads to convey our products to the East the rich lands of Minnesota would to-day be as valueless and tenantless as are those which lie a thousand miles to the west of her. With them, see what has been accomplished! In 1861 Minnesota sent more soldiers into the field to fight for the Union than she had white inhabitants in 1861. In 1857 we imported our breadstuffs, and in 1867 we exported of wheat alone twelve million bushels, which sold at an average of about two dollars per bushel, making in actual production of this one article an increase of national wealth amounting to $24,000,000; this, in addition to the amount consumed and retained for seed, and also in addition to the large exports of corn, beef, pork, potatoes, and other articles, which would amount to probably five or six millions more. President Polk in his message of December, 1846, stated the value of all the exports of the United States at $102,141,833. Minnesota, then unknown, except as a supposed inhospitable, frigid, unexplored region somewhere near the north pole, in twenty-two years thereafter exported more than one fourth as much as the entire national exports of 1846.

The average annual exports of the United States for sixteen years, from June 30, 1847, to June 30, 1863, were, of all kinds of agricultural products, (except cotton and tobacco,) $55,452,190, and of domestic products of every kind, $234,314,468.

These statistics, taken from the Annual Record, disclose the astonishing fact that in 1867, when only nine years old, the State of Minnesota exported of wheat alone an amount equal to four tenths of the average annual value of all the agricultural products (excepting cotton and tobacco) of the nation from 1847 to 1863; and an amount equal to one tenth of the average annual value of all the domestic exports of the United States of every kind, including those of the sea, the forest, the mines, of agriculture, and of manufactures during said sixteen years. The total exports by the United States of domestic produce of all kinds from 1800 to 1863 were $7,381,318,194, making an annual average for sixty-three years of $117,163,780, or only about four times the value of Minnesota's wheat exportation for the year 1867. I make these comparisons with my own State because I am proud of her, and because it is by such comparisons we are able to form a correct estimate of the vast addition the settlement and cultivation of our western Territories will make to the material wealth of the nation. The Governor of Minnesota estimates that only two per cent. of her lands have yet been brought under actual cultivation. Judge what she will do when one half, or the whole, shall be cultivated!

The Northern Pacific road, by its intersections of the Red river, the Missouri, the Yellowstone, and the various other navigable streams on its line, will form a connecting link between the navigable waters within the boundary of the United States at least a thousand miles in length; so that the combined length of the road and the river navigation with which it connects will be not less than three thousand miles. It will open to settlement the country on its own line and on said rivers to the extent of from fifty to a hundred miles on both sides, making within said limit of fifty miles an aggregate of more than one hundred and fifty million acres. Deducting one half for uncultivable lands, a very much larger deduction than the facts justify, we have seventy-five million acres of good, fertile land, such as that of my own State, that would be opened to settlement. Allowing that only one third of the good land shall be actually tilled, we will have twenty-five million acres under cultivation. The great results in Minnesota to which I have referred were produced by the cultivation of only two per cent. of the whole, or about one million acres. Multiply the products of Minnesota in 1867 by twenty-five and we have three hundred million bushels of wheat per annum, which, at one dollar per bushel, will add $300,000,000 yearly to the nation's wealth; an amount six times greater every year than the proposed loan.

It will be observed that this estimate is only for the time immediately succeeding the construction of the road, and is, by no means intended to represent even a tithe of what the productions of that country will amount to twenty years hence. It also excludes all that vast augmentation of wealth which the road will effect outside of the said narrow limit of fifty miles, and which will probably amount to very much more than I have estimated within such limit. Even in my own State the value of every acre of land will be doubled by the construction of this great thoroughfare, and her present magnificent contributions to the national resources will be many times multiplied. Instead of being on the borders of civilization she will then be in the very center of that continent which is destined to be the center of the world's commerce. When the main trunk line shall be completed private enterprise will gridiron every part of that magnificent domain with branch roads, as it has done in the older States. Instead of one hundred and fifty million acres of land, now valueless, being brought within its influence, an area of five hundred thousand square miles of fertile territory will be transformed from the solitude in which it has slept for centuries into the teeming fields and prosperous homes of happy millions.

Consider also the value of the lands retained by the Government. Within the said fifty miles limits the Government would own over a hundred million acres. Estimating only one half to be good, we have fifty millions of acres, now worth nothing, that would be made at once, by the construction of the road, worth from $1 25 to $10 per acre, making an aggregate addition from this source alone of at least $100,000,000. The fact that the Government donates her lands to actual settlers does not affect this estimate, for the reason that such donation is made because the consideration of settlement and cultivation is clearly more profitable to the Government than the money price the land would bring.

4. It will augment our imports and exports, and thereby increase the public revenue.

On this point I ask the attention of the House to a few facts and figures taken from a paper read before the Statistical Society of London, in November, 1866, by R. Dudley Baxter. He assumes it as an "axiom that the commerce of a country increases in exact proportion to the improvement of its railway system, and that railway development is one of the most powerful and evident causes of the increase of commerce."

The following statistics are adduced, together with other important facts, in proof of that proposition. Any one who will give this paper a careful reading will, I think, be convinced that there is much truth in his theory:

Proportion of Exports and Imports to Railways and Navigation in Great Britain.

	Miles of railway and navigation.	Total exports and imports.	Exports and imports per mile.
1833.....	4,000	$85,500,000	$21.275
1840.....	5,200	110,030,000	22.884
1845.....	6,441	135,000,000	20.959
1850.....	10,773	171,800,000	16.006
1855.....	12,334	209,234,000	21.098
1860.....	14,433	375,052,000	52.935
1865.....	17,289	490,000,000	28.341

In 1833 there were about four thousand miles of navigation, and exports and imports had been for some time stationary before that period.

Similar results are produced in France, as shown by the following table:

Proportion of Exports and Imports to Railways and Navigation in France.

	Navigation (7,700 miles) and railways.	Exports and imports.	Exports and imports per mile open.
1845.....	8,547	97,000,000	11.338
1850.....	9,507	102,204,000	10.750
1855.....	11,015	173,076,000	15.712
1860.....	13,286	232,192,000	17.476
1865.....	15,830	293,144,000	18.518

Here there is a steady rise in the amount per mile, checked only by the revolution of 1848.

Perhaps the most remarkable illustration of the relative increase of foreign commerce to railways may be found in Belgium.

Proportion of Exports and Imports to Railways and Navigation in Belgium.

	Canals (910 m.) and railways open.	Exports and imports.	Exports and imports per mile.
1845.....	1,295	26,920,000	22.340
1850.....	1,500	17,753,000	30.037
1855.....	1,807	72,120,000	37.818

Compare Belgium with Holland. Holland was possessed of immense advantages in the perfection of her canals, which were the finest and most numerous in the world; in the large tonnage of her shipping; in her access by the Rhine to the heart of Germany; and in the command of the German trade, which was brought to her ships at Amsterdam and Rotterdam. The Dutch relied on these advantages and neglected railways. The Belgian Government adopted a wise and extensive system of railway improvements. Observe the results. In 1839 the Dutch exports and imports were £28,500,000, nearly double those of Belgium. In 1862 they were £50,000,000, when those of Belgium were £78,000,000. Thus, while Holland had doubled her commerce Belgium had increased fivefold. The former possessed a territory thirteen thousand eight hundred and ninety square miles in extent; the latter eleven thousand three hundred and thirteen miles. Their populations were not far from equal.

Various other statistics are given, proving conclusively that in all commercial nations a distinct correspondence exists between the means of internal communication and foreign commerce; but I will content myself by referring to those of our own country.

Proportion of Exports and Imports to Railways and Canals in the United States.

	Canals (6,000 miles) and railways.	Total exports and imports.	Exports and imports per mile.
1830.....	6,011	$21,000,000	$5.130
1844.....	10,310	45,739,000	4.437
1850.....	13,475	63,738,000	5.102
1855.....	23,398	111,797,000	4.778
1860.....	34,770	158,810,000	4.567

In 1830 the imports and exports were..... $155,000,000
In 1793 the imports and exports were..... 57,109,000

Increase in the thirty-seven years preceding the railroad era..... $97,891,000

Average annual increase, $2,646,243.
Average annual per centage increase, 4.63.

In 1861 the imports and exports were..... $762,238,550
In 1830 the imports and exports were..... 155,000,000

Increase in the thirty-one years of railroad development..... $607,238,550

Average annual increase, $19,589,950.
Average annual per centage increase, 12.57.

Showing an average annual increase more than two and a half times greater since the beginning of the railroad era than before.

But I must not extend these comparisons. Arrange the statistics of imports and exports in any way you choose, compare their increase with railroad development during any given period that may be selected, and similar results will be disclosed.

These statistics certainly show a very remarkable correspondence between the increase of railways and the increase of imports and exports, and nowhere is it more apparent than in the United States. This increase will doubtless be much greater per mile when we shall have completed the proposed Pacific roads, for the reason that they will develop an immensely rich mineral region, and be the great highways for the commerce of the world. The foreign commerce of a nation depends mainly upon the value of the products of its soil, its workshops, and its mines, and upon the facilities it affords for the internal interchange of those products for the commodities of other countries. Hence, considering the vast extent of the United States, the millions of square miles wholly undeveloped, the sparseness of the population, and the difficulty in exchanging commodities between distant points, we may reasonably expect to find that the relation between the increase of imports and exports and railway development will be more striking in this country than in any other. Since 1830 every additional mile of road has been followed by an additional twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars of foreign commerce. May we not, therefore, safely assume that the construction of the Northern Pacific, with all the advantages and probable results I have enumerated, will add to our imports and exports at least $20,000 per mile, or an aggregate of $40,000,000 per annum? As imports are generally about equal to exports, we shall have from this cause an additional $20,000,000 of imports, on which a tariff equal to the present will yield an annual revenue of over eight million dollars.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC ROAD IS A COMMERCIAL NECESSITY.

First, because one road will not be adequate to the business of the country; and second, because no other route will so certainly control the commerce of Europe and Asia. I have conversed with some gentlemen on this subject who seem to fear that there will not be room and business for more than one road. Let us briefly examine this objection. It is only fifteen years since, by the opening of the Cleveland and Toledo railway, a continuous line was formed between Chicago and the eastern seaboard. Now there are no less than five double-track roads connecting that city with New York and Boston, and all of them are overwhelmed with business. The increase of the tonnage of these great through lines furnishes one of the most remarkable illustrations of the wonderful material progress of the United States, as well as a conclusive answer to the objection under consideration. The following table, copied from the Manual, will show the increase of tonnage on three of those lines for ten years:

Roads.	1857. Tons.	1867. Tons.	Increase, percentage.
New York Central.....	838,791	1,607,926	98.55
Eric.....	978,069	3,484,546	256.26
Pennsylvania.....	530,420	4,060,538	654.24

Some half dozen or more roads connecting with these great lines are pushing forward as rapidly as possible to form a connection with the Omaha and San Francisco road, which, it is supposed, is to do the business not only of the Pacific slope, but also of Europe and Asia. Now, sir, in view of the fact that fifteen years ago there was no railroad connection between Chicago and the East, and in view of the immense increase of internal commerce that now crowds all the five great thoroughfares between those points, is it not absurd to suppose that one road can accommodate the trade between the people of the Atlantic and Pacific slopes, and between the six hundred millions of Asia and the two hundred millions of Europe? The fact is, that the commerce of our own country will, in less than ten years, crowd with business two more Pacific roads. There is ample room for three. Mr. Baxter, from whose paper I have quoted, demonstrates that in Great Britain railroads will pay that have three and a half miles of country on each side to support them. The question we debate is, whether a territory fifteen hundred miles in width will not be crowded if we build three roads across it.

But it is in regard to its relations to foreign commerce that the advantages of this road are most conspicuous. The most intelligent statesmen of Europe concede that the day is not far distant when the trade between that continent and Asia will be carried on across this country.

In 1864 a paper was read before the British North American Association by Colonel Sygne, of the queen's royal engineers, in which he makes this statement:

"America is geographically a connecting link between the continents of Europe and Asia, and not a monstrous barrier between them. It lies in the track of the nearest and best connection, and this fact needs only to be fully recognized to render it in practice what it unquestionably is in the essential points of distance and direction."

Says Lord Bury:

"Our trade (English) on the Pacific ocean with China and with India must ultimately be carried on through our North American possessions. At any rate our political and commercial supremacy will have utterly departed from us if we neglect that just and important consideration, and if we fail to carry out to its fullest extent the physical advantages which our country offers to us and which we have only to stretch out our hand to take advantage of."

English statesmen and capitalists are alive to the importance of this subject, and their Government has already sent out a corps of engineers, which has made a careful survey of the whole country from Canada to the Pacific, and reported that a railroad through the British North American possessions is entirely practicable. And in furtherance of this scheme she has granted $20,000,000 to aid in the construction of the Grand Trunk road to Halifax. While, therefore, it is substantially settled that the commerce of Asia and Europe is to find its pathway across this continent, it is by no means conceded that that pathway is to be upon our soil, or that its incalculable benefits are to be enjoyed by our country. Great Britain, ever on the alert to increase her power and continue her commercial supremacy, can compete with us for this great carrying trade by a railroad through her own possessions. That she will do so unless prevented by our superior diligence no one who has studied her history can doubt. In view of these facts, and of the immense "physical advantages" the United States enjoy, important considerations arise in regard to the location of our Pacific railways.

It is now simply a question of statesmanship whether the United States or England shall monopolize and control the transcontinental commerce of the world, and whether the vast fertile country on our northern border shall become tributary to us, and eventually a part of our own territory, or remain forever under British dominion.

Commerce seeks the shortest and cheapest transit, and the nation that can supply these conditions will control it. We have seen that the northern route has the advantage of over six hundred miles in its connections with the navigable waters of the Atlantic and Pacific, and that the distance from New York to the Pacific is four hundred and twenty miles less by this than by the Central route. In addition to this important fact it is also true that Puget sound is some eight hundred miles nearer than San Francisco to the principal Asiatic ports. This last statement is confirmed by all the well-informed persons from the Pacific coast with whom I have conversed on the subject, and the fact is accounted for by the prevailing ocean winds and currents. It is also confirmed by Hon. G. M. Dodge, chief engineer of the Union Pacific railroad. In a report made to that company in December, 1867, urging the adoption of a line to connect the Union Pacific with Puget sound, Mr. Dodge says:

"This inland sea includes the whole body of water flowing into the Pacific at the Straits of San Juan de Fuca, and surpasses the Mediterranean in the safety of its navigation and the security and anchorage of its harbors. For all the China, Japan, and India trade coming down the Pacific coast it would save the water transportation for the entire length of coast line from the Straits of San Juan de Fuca to San Francisco, as all ships coming from China, India, &c., make our coast near the mouth of these straits."

Turning to the map of the world we find the Amoor river taking its rise in Central Asia and flowing eastwardly to the Pacific on a parallel of latitude some two or three degrees north of Puget sound. This river is navigable for a distance of two thousand six hundred miles into the interior of that continent. Its most considerable southern branch, the Soungaree, is also navigable to within a few hundred miles of Pekin. The Amoor is the Mississippi of the East, and through its waters we may have access by steam to the very heart of the Asiatic continent. Some conception may be formed of the commerce soon to spring up on that river from the fact that at Kyachta and Mai-Mat-tschin, Chinese and Russian trading points, situated four hundred miles west of its head of navigation, the imports and exports amount to $21,000,000 per annum. The Chinese trade has already assumed gigantic proportions. The exports of tea and silk from the single port of Shanghai for the year ending July 1, 1860, were as follows:

	Tea, lbs.	Silk, bales.
Great Britain.....	31,621,000	19,084
United States.....	18,299,000	1,554
Canada.....	1,172,000
France.....		47,000
Total.....	51,092,000	67,638

The Amoor river, but recently opened to commerce, is destined at an early day to become the chief outlet for the teas and silks of China and for the skins, furs, and other commodities of Russia. Taking into the account the ocean winds and currents before referred to, and the fact that the mouth of this river is two or three degrees north of the latitude of the straits of San Juan De Fuca, it is evident that the western terminus of the northern road must necessarily be the point at which the commerce of the country it drains will strike our shores. Beginning, therefore, at a point twenty-six hundred miles in the interior of Asia, and only a few hundred miles from Pekin, we will have by way of the Northern Pacific road almost an air line of steam communication to the principal ports of Europe, and only seventeen hundred and seventy-five miles of the entire distance will be by rail. Or, if we estimate the navigable rivers on the line of the road and having the same general direction with it, we may, by the construction of an aggregate of only eight hundred and twenty-five miles of road at different points, as already shown, furnish connected steam transportation between the interior of Asia and Liverpool. If it be true that commerce seeks the shortest and cheapest transit surely this route is indicated as the great highway of the nations.

But if the English Government shall build the contemplated road through British America it will have nearly all the advantages of shortness of line between the waters of the oceans and also of proximity to the Asiatic continent possessed by the Northern Pacific. If our Government shall neglect the claims of this road, and Great Britain shall construct hers, with the advantage over all others of more than a thousand miles in distance, aided, as it will be, by the commercial dominion of England on the seas, British America, and not the United States, will own and control the chief thoroughfare of the nations. The only road that can prevent the construction of the British line, or which can compete with it if built, will be the Northern. Its prompt construction will indefinitely postpone the other, and will in a short time, by means of emigration from this country to British America and the affinities and necessities of trade between the two localities, peacefully and without expense annex that country to ours, where it belongs, and thereby secure forever to the United States the incalculable advantage of controlling the channels of the world's commerce. We will then be prepared to successfully challenge England's boasted commercial supremacy, and to gather the profits of our superior "physical advantages."

In addition to the many great pecuniary advantages and benefits to which I have referred our Pacific railways may be made to furnish

A SINKING FUND FOR THE PAYMENT OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

This proposition contains nothing new or chimerical. France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Austria, and Holland, following the example of Belgium, have all adopted a system whereby their railways furnish a sinking fund for such purpose. A large portion of the public debt of all those nations will by the application of the fund thus raised be extinguished at the end of various terms of eighty-five, ninety, and ninety-nine years.

In France it will in less than ninety years entirely relieve the people of the whole burden of the national debt of $2,206,000,000.

This sinking fund is raised in the countries named by the imposition of a small tax or duty on the earnings of their roads. Why may we not act upon this principle, and thereby make our railways the means of still greater relief to the tax-payers of the nation? The principle involved has been found practically successful in other countries; may it not be so in ours? Why shall not those great and profitable enterprises which demand so largely the aid of the people be made to reciprocate by assisting directly as well as indirectly to bear the burdens of the people? This would seem to be especially proper and expedient when it is borne in mind that these roads are to supply to Europe and Asia the shortest, quickest, and cheapest means of communication, and that, in consideration of the benefits thus to be conferred, it is but just that the people of those countries should pay a reasonable tribute.

It would perhaps be improper to attempt it upon roads built wholly by private enterprise and private capital; but not so in regard to the Pacific roads, which are so largely aided by the Government, and which are national in their character. They are the recipients of the nation's favors, and it is eminently proper that they should contribute directly to the discharge of the national obligations.

A Government tax of only two per cent. on gross earnings will prove no burden to the companies and no injury to the business of the roads, but if properly applied as a sinking fund for the payment of the public debt it will in a few years produce astonishing results. I suggest gross earnings instead of net for the reason that there will be less opportunity for fraud in making returns.

The average gross earnings of the New York Central, Pennsylvania, Erie, and Michigan Central roads for 1867 were $26,200 per mile. The aggregate length of their trunk lines to the Pacific will be, in round numbers, six thousand miles. Their gross earnings, estimated at the same rate with the four roads just named, will amount to an aggregate of $157,200,000 per annum. This is doubtless far below what such earnings will be a few years hence; but for the purpose of illustrating my proposition I will estimate them at only $100,000,000 per annum, on which a Government tax of two per cent. will yield an annual sinking fund of $2,000,000. This fund, if invested every year for ninety years at four per cent. compound interest, will at the end of that time amount to $2,530,812,000, a sum exceeding the entire debt.

If this sinking fund of $2,000,000 per annum be applied annually to the purchase of United States bonds drawing four per cent. interest, it will in ninety years (if the interest accruing on all bonds purchased be annually reinvested in bonds at the same rate) result in placing in possession of the Government every dollar of its bonds and in relieving the people of the entire burden of the debt; provided only that other means shall be used for the payment of the interest. In other words, if a sufficient sum be raised by taxation or otherwise to pay the interest on the debt, this railway sinking fund will if it be annually invested and reinvested in the manner proposed, in ninety years absorb the entire principal of the debt.

If, instead of being used as a sinking fund as just proposed, it be applied when received to the redemption of the bonds, it of course will not effect the entire extinguishment of the debt within the period named, but the relief it will afford to the people by the retirement of the bonds and the consequent reduction of annual interest will in the aggregate amount to the same sum.

Now, sir, I would authorize the funding of our entire bonded debt into American consols, having ninety years to run, drawing four per cent. interest, principal and interest expressly payable in specie. I would then, by a temporary loan of Government credit properly secured, aid the construction of at least two more roads to the Pacific, and impose upon them a tax such as suggested. The money raised by this tax should constitute a sinking fund, to be applied to the purchase of the four per cent. consols in the manner prescribed, the result of which would be an entire absorption of the debt in ninety years. Certain and adequate provision being thus made for the accumulation of a fund sufficient to pay the debt, capitalists at home and abroad would readily invest in so desirable a security. While bearing a higher rate of interest than the debts of other nations, the security would be equal to theirs, and the duration of the consols would commend them to those who desire to invest on long time. In this way our entire bonded debt may be speedily funded at four per cent.

interest, which reduction of interest will at once diminish the current expenses of the Government more than $42,000,000 per annum. The effect therefore of this proposition, if adopted, will be to reduce the taxation of the people to the extent of $42,000,000 per annum, and at the same time provide a sinking fund that will ultimately relieve them of the entire burden of the debt.

The fact, therefore, that we have an immense debt, which these roads will so largely assist in paying is one of the strongest arguments in favor of the aid proposed. We have already seen that the burden of the debt decreases in exactly the same ratio that the national wealth increases. The relation of the debt to our present property is as one dollar to twelve dollars. Double the amount of national wealth, and it will be as fifty cents of debt to twelve dollars of property. In other words, the increase of property one hundred per cent. is equivalent to the decrease of the burden of the debt fifty per cent.; that is to say, the addition of $1,200,000,000 to the wealth of the nation is equivalent to the actual payment of $50,000,000 on the debt. In the same manner and in the same ratio the increase of wealth will diminish the burden of annual interest on the debt. Hence, while by the construction of these roads the national wealth will be increased many hundred millions, and the burden of annual interest will be thereby proportionately diminished, they may also be made to furnish a sinking fund which, properly applied, will greatly reduce the rate of interest and finally pay the debt itself.

Of course this system cannot be adopted unless the tax to be imposed shall be the same on all the Pacific roads, including those already aided by the Government. To impose it upon one and not upon all would be to make a distinction that would work injuriously. There will be, I apprehend, no practical difficulty on this point.

In calculating the period within which the proposed sinking fund will extinguish the debt I have assumed that the interest on our bonded debt is to be reduced to four per cent, if the rate should be higher the time required for such absorption would be proportionately shorter.

I have assumed that the probable grossearnings of the Pacific roads will be for the next ninety years $10,000 per mile less than the present average aggregate earnings of the New York Central, Erie, Pennsylvania, and Michigan Central roads. A moment's consideration will show that this estimate is unreasonably low. Forty-one years ago the entire tonnage crossing the Alleghany mountains both ways did not exceed thirty million pounds per annum. Thirty-two years ago the annual tonnage coming from the West through the Erie canal amounted to only one hundred and twelve million pounds. The Commissioner of the General Land Office states, in his recent able report, that "wagon freights to the Pacific are now estimated at two hundred and thirty thousand tons (four hundred and sixty million pounds) per annum," an amount fifteen times greater than the tonnage crossing the Alleghany mountains in 1827, and more than four hundred per cent. in excess of the tonnage from the West through the Erie canal in 1836. Within the last ten years the business of all the railroads in the United States has increased from one hundred to six hundred per cent. At this rate of increase how shall we estimate the probable earnings of these great inter-oceanic thoroughfares, when, thirty years hence the transcontinental and local business of a nation numbering one hundred million people and owning two hundred and fifty billion dollars of property shall be poured upon them? And to all this must be added the trade of China, Japan, India, and Europe, "a trade along whose slow and painful track, when it was conducted by beasts of burden and by oars and sails, instead of by the iron-horse and ocean steamship, great cities sprang up in the desert sands of Asia and on the coast of the Mediterranean. Babylon, Nineveh, Palmyra, Bagdad, Damascus, Constantinople, Alexandria, Rome, Venice, Genoa, and London are the outgrowth of this trade in former centuries"—a trade that will hereafter "found such cities in the new, healthful, and inviting regions through which its flow is destined to enrich the world; and Oregon and Washington as well as California, Montana as well as Utah, will hereafter have their San Franciscos, Chicagos, St. Louises, Cincinnati, and New Yorks—great emporia of an internal commerce heretofore unknown, as well as of the world-encircling commerce of the Indies."

Some conception of the extent of this traffic may be formed from the fact that even now, while it finds its tedious way around the Cape of Good Hope, across the Isthmus of Suez, or by weary and painful caravan routes across the eastern continent, its estimated amount is $300,000,000 per annum; and also by the fact stated in the "Parliamentary Papers" of 1866, volume twenty-six, that the importations of tea alone into Great Britain from China and Japan for three years were, for 1863, 136,803,218 pounds; for 1864, 124,359,243 pounds; for 1865, 121,156,712 pounds; total, 382,319,173 pounds.

In view of all these facts I submit that a tax of two per cent. on the gross earnings of these roads will long before the expiration of the present century be far more likely to exceed $6,000,000 per annum than to fall below $2,000,000; and hence the payment of the debt may be in this way effected much earlier than the time named.

I have said that the northern route seems to have been pointed out by the hand of nature as the great highway of the nations. In the words of Governor Fuller, "The road, as projected, follows the wavy outline of the isothermal temperate zone of the northern hemisphere, along which civilization makes the circuit of the globe. This zone contains the zodiac of empires. Along its axis appear the great cities of the world. Along this belt, encircling the globe, we discover the chief center of intelligence and power and the greatest intensity of energy and progress. Along this axis, hardly varying one hundred leagues, civilization has traveled as by an inevitable instinct since creation's dawn." In its topographical and meteorological conditions, also, this route appears peculiarly adapted to the great purpose for which it was evidently designed. Oceans, lakes, and rivers seem to be located for its advantage. The rough and rocky summits of the mountains are depressed to afford it a convenient passage. Warm breezes from the southern ocean meet the tempered winds from the east in its mountain passes and diffuse over them a mild and healthful climate. Ocean currents and winds sweeping over the Pacific from the southwest force the commerce of Asia to its western depot, while one of the finest inland seas of the world affords that commerce a safe and convenient anchorage.

Now, sir, in addition to all these physical advantages, we have seen that this enterprise will require no outlay of money by the Government, but, on the other hand, it will diminish the public expenditures, and, by the development of our immense resources, vastly enlarge the basis of public credit, augment the national revenues, and thereby reduce the public burdens. The people understand these things, and hence their anxiety that Congress shall prove equal to the high statesmanship which can discern the great future before us. State Legislatures have memorialized us to aid it. Boards of Trade in nearly all the principal cities have indorsed it. And but a few days ago the National Board of Trade, which met at Cincinnati, representing the opinions and wishes of the shrewd, conservative merchants, manufacturers, and other business men and taxpayers of nearly every city in the Union, resolved, with great unanimity, "that this national convention earnestly urges upon Congress the patriotic duty of granting immediate and adequate aid to perfect our system of Pacific railroads," which "system," the resolution says, requires the construction of both the Northern and Southern lines. It is demanded by the whole people: by the merchant, because it will enlarge the area of his trade; by the manufacturer, because it will increase the demand for his products; by the farmer, because it will afford him a market; by the miner, because it will enable him to command the appliances necessary to success; by the laborer, because it will enlarge the field of labor, enhance the value of its products, and necessarily increase its compensation; by the enlightened statesman and true political economist, because it will augment the public wealth and diminish the public burdens; by the philanthropist, because it will afford a peaceful solution of our Indian troubles; by the patriot, because he discerns in it and in kindred enterprises the true secret of national prosperity and progress.

Gentlemen may imagine that a pompous pretense of economy will blind the eyes of their constituents and increase their own temporary popularity; but let them be assured that they who presume upon the ignorance of the people will find themselves sadly disappointed. The people of this Republic are proud of her. They know her resources and are determined to develop them. They foresee the grandeur and glory to which she may attain and resolve to realize them. Development is the watchword of the century! In the world's great onward march America must keep step to the drum-beat of the nations, or fall behind a disgraced straggler from the ranks. We may, by our narrow views and mistaken ideas of economy, retard, but we cannot wholly obstruct the nation's progress.

By that economy which we all profess; by that progress of which we are all proud; and in the name of the people whom we serve, I appeal to gentlemen to give this enterprise their support.

RIGHTS OF LABOR.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, being indebted for my place in this House to the workingmen of my district, it is both my privilege and my duty to present the views of those whom I have the honor to represent—a privilege because I am proud of my constituency, and a duty the more imperative because I am the only Representative elected in the distinctive interests of the industrial classes independent of party politics.

Who are these workingmen who are claiming to be a political power, and what are the wrongs of which they complain, rendering combination on their part necessary or desirable? In our definition of workingmen we embrace all who are engaged in productive industry; all who are in good faith obeying the Divine decree by eating bread in the sweat of their own faces, and not living upon the honest earnings of others. Not those only who open up and cultivate farms, build cities, construct railroads, and toil in workshops, but those, also, who by intellectual labor extract the principles of science from the great arcana of nature, and give them practical form of art and direct the hand of industry. In short, every human being who, by physical or intellectual labor, contributes to the substantial wealth of the nation and aids in making "the wilderness and solitary place blossom like the rose."

Those who sent me here and multiplied thousands of others in sympathy with them believe that too much of our legislation, State and national, is in the direct interest of capital; that the grasping and insatiable demands of the money power secure improper advantages over the laboring classes; that the interests of the toiling millions are subordinated to those of the few who possess wealth. The great majority of our workingmen are poor, and however provident they may be, unless they engage in some scheme of speculation by which they can appropriate to themselves the earnings of others they live and die poor. There is something wrong when honest, persevering, patient industry, with temperance, frugality, and economy, brings nothing but a scanty subsistence. I believe with just and equal laws, impartially administered, the sons and daughters of toil would receive a share of their productions beyond a meager living. It is a matter of common observation that the rich are rapidly increasing in wealth, while the poor are as speedily becoming more abject. How is this anti-republican tendency of things to be arrested, or shall we go backward and downward until the industrious poor become the mere vassals of a bloated aristocracy?

The great and good Lincoln truthfully said:

"Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration."

He said of workingmen:

"Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities upon them until all of liberty be lost."

These wise words of one of the noblest men in human history should be heeded by those in whose behalf they were spoken.

The tendency of capital is to centralize, monopolize, and control, and as money is power, its exactions are responded to by legislators. That capital should own labor was the foundation on which the advocates of African slavery based their theory of a perfect social organization. They asserted that to attain a high Christian civilization there must be a privileged class, supported by the sweat and toil of others. Senator Hammond, of South Carolina, was a fearless and able advocate of this doctrine. In a speech of great force and power he made some strictures on northern society which are quite suggestive. In speaking of the laborers of the North he characterized them as "white slaves and the mudsills of society, who perform the drudgery of life, which requires but a low order of intellect and but little skill, its chief requisites being vigor, docility, fidelity." He says:

"That class you must have, or you will not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the mudsill of society and of political government, and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air as to build either the one or the other except on this mudsill. We do not think that whites should be slaves either by law or necessity. Our slaves are black, of another and inferior race; yours are white, of your own race. You are brothers of one blood; they are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote; we give them no political power. Yours do vote, and are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret that the ballot-box is stronger than an army and would combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed."

This speech contains a valuable lesson to the laborers of the nation. By the simple logic of events, by the overthrow of African slavery, by unequal tax laws, by the establishment of monopolies, by the granting of special privileges, by banking systems, by ten thousand ways in which capital appropriates the products of labor without an equivalent, the masses are being brought to an appreciation of their humbled condition. They are learning in the school of experience that the ballot-box is stronger than an army; and I mistake the signs of the times if the day is not near when our "white slaves" will reconstruct society.

Our terrible civil war has stricken the shackles from the limbs of black men, but slavery has been destroyed only in form. Its spirit still exists and rules with despotic sway. Money does not own the flesh and muscles and bones, but it is the legalized master of labor and appropriates its products with a merciless and insolent power. It has been said that revolutions never go backward, and we may therefore hope that the full results of the late civil strife will not be attained until our northern "mudsills," our white slaves, are emancipated. Labor unions are springing into existence inspired with a lofty and resolute purpose to assert and maintain the rights of labor. The inquiry is being made why it is that those "who rise early, sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness," are but little better than mendicants, while the few who live in vicious idleness fare sumptuously every day. The divine law, "if a man does not work neither shall he eat" has been abrogated, and the man who does not work has everything to eat, while the hardest worker often goes supperless to bed.

If white men and women are not bought and sold, they gnaw the bones, eat the crumbs, and wear the cast-off garments of idle and luxurious capitalists. There is, from some cause, an unfair distribution of the products of labor between non-producing capital and producing labor.

We are told that thus it has ever been; men of money have appropriated in their own way and upon their own terms labor and its productions; that there always will be the rich and the poor, and the latter the servant of the former. I am no agrarian, no advocate of an equal division of property or of any division but such as providence and improvidence, industry and idleness, intelligence and ignorance, virtue and vice, create. I am alike opposed to all legislation which discriminates in favor of accumulated wealth. The creation of all monopolies, whether in land or money, is an imposition on the rights of labor and in violation of the spirit of our free institutions. I believe that a Government which has the right to conscript a poor man and put him in the ranks to fight its battles and dictate to him the wages he shall receive has an equal right to seize the rich man's purse to pay the man in the ranks and dictate the rate of interest he shall receive for the use of his money. The rights of persons should be as sacred as the rights of property, and a forced loan, with or without interest, is as justifiable as a conscript law.

I propose to refer more specifically to some of the wrongs of which the workingmen complain, and against which we will protest at the ballot-box, and through the political parties or in spite of them will emancipate ourselves, or in the expressive language of Senator Hammond, "reconstruct society."

In the first place we demand a thorough and radical change in the policy of Congress in relation to the disposition of the public domain. In the ownership of the soil lies the foundation of civilization, liberty, and progress, and our existence as a Republic depends much upon a thorough distribution of the lands among the people. It is said that twelve men own one half the land in Scotland, one hundred and fifty persons one half of England, and four per cent. of our population own one half of the property in this country. Richard Carlisle says:

"On the question of the monopoly of the land I am decided that it is the master evil in our political condition."

Workingmen claim that the public lands are the common property of the whole people; that Congress is only the trustee, and as such is transcending its powers when it undertakes to grant these lands to railroads or convey them to speculators and land pirates. We claim that they should be disposed of only to actual settlers in small quantities, and at a minimum price. "The heavens are the Lord's, but the earth He hath given to the children of men," and whoever wishes to build himself a home and erect an altar under the protection of our flag should be allowed to select a spot anywhere upon the public domain. With equal right might the atmosphere be bottled and the sunshine barreled up and sold out in lots to suit purchasers as the earth to be hacked in pieces and withheld from its rightful owners.

Within a few years Congress has given of the people's patrimony to various western and southern States to aid in the construction of railroads fifty-seven million acres; for canals and other public improvements, seventeen million more. In 1862 Congress granted to the States, for the endowment of agricultural colleges, thirty thousand acres for each Senator and Representative in Congress, making in all nine millions six hundred thousand acres, or enough to make ten States larger than Rhode Island. What has become of these lands, and where are the schools of agriculture? The land scrip has been sold to speculators at prices ranging from thirty to eighty cents per acre. One individual purchased a half million acres, and one firm in my own State bought and advertises for sale two and a half million acres. Schools of learning are yet to be endowed upon the pittance obtained for the land scrip. Land monopolies are far more certain to be established than colleges!

The Pacific railroad, a giant monopoly which may yet make Presidents and dictate the legislation of the Republic, has or will receive by the criminal prodigality of Congress, in addition to enormous subsidies in bonds, one hundred and twenty-four million acres of land; enough to make four States larger than New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. How these subsidies in bonds and lands were procured and who are the parties beneficially interested may yet be a subject of investigation. I understand that a hungry swarm of railroad adventurers now fill these lobbies who are pressing their patriotic claims to a large share of the remaining unappropriated territory.

Congress, holding the public lands in trust for the landless poor, has already voted away an area of country larger by five millions of acres than the six New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio. It may be necessary for the development of our national resources and make the public lands accessible that these great highways of travel and commerce should be constructed, and Government aid may be indispensable to secure their construction. If so, let the proceeds of land sales to actual occupants or bonds or money be appropriated, but not the fee-simple of the lands. The advocates of the congressional policy tell us that the landless poor may still find good lands at the low price of one dollar and a quarter per acre within convenient distance of these railroads. The fact is, however, that as soon as a road is projected keen speculators at once buy up all the desirable lands within a reasonable distance and hold them at prices beyond the reach of the poor pioneer, and he is driven still further back to find a home. When he has opened up his farm the railroad speculators derive greater benefit than he from his labor by the enhanced value of their more accessible lands, and he is contributing to make their broad acres still more unavailable to the settler of limited means. In the name of the landless million I protest against the creation of land monopolies. In their name and as their representative I ask that every acre not already squandered and every acre that may be acquired by purchase or theft from the Indians be sacredly set apart for homesteads.

Great as are the evils of land monopoly, and however necessary legislative reform may be to secure the rights of the landless in the soil, and however determined we are to persist in our efforts until our end is accomplished, there is a greater evil of which we complain, and which, if not removed, the producers of wealth must remain enslaved, and we shall be a free popular Government only in name. The entire monetary system of this Government, copied as it is from the monarchies of the Old World, is anti-democratic and subversive of the rights and destructive to the interests of the masses of the people. The whole range of legislation on finance is a cunning device to rob labor of its just rewards, and build up and sustain an aristocracy of wealth. Financial reconstruction is now a necessity. With boundless undeveloped resources, with inviting fields for the employment of labor, there are to-day in our land two million men and women who are able, willing, and anxious to work, who can find nothing to do, and who are on the verge of starvation. Tens of thousands more are only partially employed; and those who do toil early and late are scarcely able with niggardly economy to supply themselves and their dependent families with the common necessities of life. While this is the sad condition of the million, the few capitalists are rioting in luxury and fattening upon the earnings of others.

At the last session of Congress I introduced a bill to establish a uniform currency and provide for the management and liquidation of the public debt. Believing that the adoption of the principles of that bill will be a proclamation of emancipation to the toiling millions of my countrymen, would give them full and remunerative employment, make capital the servant instead of the master of labor, and that relief can only be found in this direction, I shall, in the remaining portion of the hour allowed me, give the reasons for my faith. The change proposed in our entire monetary or financial system is radical and fundamental. While our fathers rejected the political institutions of the Old World, and carved out a new model of civil government, they adopted, and we still retain, the monarchical systems and theories of money and finance.

The system proposed by my bill, and which has been fully indorsed by the National Labor Union, involves the abandonment of the cherished idea that gold and silver are the only fit materials out of which to coin money. The opinion which has obtained and still influences the public mind, that a circulating medium must be coined out of some material which is scarce and difficult to procure, arises from a misconception of the nature and functions of money.

Whatever is endowed by the sovereign power in the nation with the qualities of representing, measuring, exchanging, and accumulating value by interest is money; and any circulating medium not endowed by Congress with all these powers or functions is not money, though the material be the finest gold. The most important function of money is to facilitate exchanges of property, and its value, therefore, is purely legal. The idea that the value of money inheres in the material of which it is made is wholly false and pernicious. When this heathen superstition, this fundamental error, and the mystifications by which interested financiers and political economists have concealed the true nature of money are dispelled, it will be found that its present centralizing power is as gross an imposition upon the common sense of men as it is upon the rights of labor and property. Lexicographers, political economists, bankers, usurers, and even statesmen, tell us that "money is stamped coin of gold and silver," but the necessities of our modern civilization and the emergencies of the people are making it necessary to modify our definitions and revise our theories. Locke and other writers on political economy declare that gold and silver are selected as the most suitable materials for money because of their inherent or intrinsic value. It is true that these metals have an intrinsic value and can be wrought into useful utensils and beautiful ornaments, and when so wrought they become articles of commerce, but when coined and stamped as money their intrinsic value is not considered. Intrinsic value is commercial; money value is legal. A gold dollar is worth one hundred cents only because Congress has so decreed, and it would still be worth one hundred cents if the quantity of gold in the country was quadrupled in an hour. If every gold coin in the United States was annihilated our property, our wealth would remain the same; we would only lose its legal representative, the means of exchange of commodities. Benjamin Franklin truthfully said:

"Gold and silver are not intrinsically of equal value with iron, a metal in itself capable of many more beneficial uses to mankind; and but for the estimation in which they were held a pound of gold would not be a real equivalent for a bushel of wheat. Any other well-founded credit is as much an equivalent as gold and silver."

The same wise man said:

"Gold and silver have undoubtedly some properties that give them a fitness above paper as a medium of exchange, especially when a country has occasion to carry its money abroad."

But he adds:

"The estimation in which these metals are held abroad deprive a country of the quantity of currency that should be retained as a necessary instrument of its internal commerce."

If this was true when Franklin wrote, it is preëminently true now, when our internal trade and commerce are ten thousandfold greater, and our foreign trade has indefinitely increased without a corresponding increase in the quantity of gold and silver.

In a rude state of society, where articles to be exchanged are few and the exchanges are easily effected, but little money is required. In more complex and cultivated communities, where there is an infinite division of labor and industries are diversified, more money is indispensable. Wampum and beads will answer the purposes of a legal tender among savages. Almonds and shells may purchase the necessities of life in India. Iron nails were once money in Scotland; dried codfish was a legal tender in Newfoundland; sugar in the West India islands; musket balls in Massachusetts; tobacco in Maryland and Virginia, and whisky was the currency with which we paid the Indians for their lands. It is worthy of a passing remark that here in the District of Columbia by un repealed laws tobacco is declared to be a lawful currency, and in some cases to the exclusion of even gold and silver; many fines and penalties are assessed and must be paid in tobacco. The law even prescribes the annual interest which may be taken for the loans of tobacco, and payable only in tobacco. Gold and silver may answer the purposes of exchange among semi-barbarians, but they are wholly inadequate to the demands of our civilization.

Recognizing their insufficiency civilized Governments have resorted to various expedients to supply the needed currency, but they have always kept their eye on the so-called precious metals, and have vainly attempted to subordinate everything to their standard. They have commissioned a few men who had coin to furnish an adequate currency for the people, and clothed this favored few with power to issue five, ten, or fifteen paper promises to pay a dollar for every dollar of gold within their reach. In this way banks have been instituted, those ingenious contrivances to rob labor of its rewards, swindle the masses of the people, and give unjust advantages to wealth.

The object of banks of issue has been to make up for the deficiency in the volume of metallic currency, and their establishment is an acknowledgment that gold and silver are wholly inadequate to supply the necessities of trade and commerce. In creating banks of issue Government has conferred upon a moneyed aristocracy powers which the people only, through their Representatives in Congress, can constitutionally exercise.

I affirm that the entire gold coinage of the world would scarcely be sufficient to answer the legitimate requirements for money in this country alone. Advanced civilization, the infinite division and subdivision of labor, diversified industries and employments, vast extent of territory, great enterprises, extensive exchanges all require an increased and constantly increasing volume of money. If to-day gold and silver were sufficient in quantity, on account of their commercial value they are exportable commodities, to-morrow they may be so reduced as to seriously affect the exchangeable values of all other commodities and injure all kinds of legitimate business.

The sole object and office of money, all that it is wanted for, is to be used as a legal instrument in facilitating exchanges and making payments. It is solely a creature of law, and it is a matter of no moment whatever whether its material has or has not an intrinsic or commercial value. The value of gold and silver as commodities is regulated by the law of supply and demand just like wheat or cotton. As money, however, their value being purely legal, the abundance or scarcity of the metals does not affect it. How absurd, then, is the assumption that the inherent properties of gold, which gives it value as an article of commerce, has anything to do with its being a measure of value as money. As a commodity it is one thing, as money it is another and very different thing. The legal value of a gold dollar is purely an arbitrary assumption, not absolute or independent of law.

It is said that gold and silver are the money of the world, and as our commercial relations are world-wide we cannot change it; that as all commercial nations have legalized the so-called precious metals we cannot maintain commercial relations with them unless we also legalize them as money. To this I answer that our coin is not current or legal money beyond the limits of our own national jurisdiction. Foreign nations receive our coinage by the standard fixed by their own laws, and greatly prefer bullion to coin. The very fact that other nations use gold and silver as materials for the coinage of money, added to the undeniable assertion that they are insufficient in quantity to answer the necessities of domestic and foreign trade, is an unanswerable argument against our employing them for this purpose.

Legitimate commerce is the exchange of the products of one country for those of another. All beyond mere barter is a matter of debt, and if we imported in excess of our exports $300,000,000 worth (this being about the sum of our coinage) we must part with all our coin, and we are left without anything to represent our domestic values and make home payments, thus deranging the entire industrial and commercial interests of the nation and involving men of enterprise in hopeless bankruptcy. With money not valuable as an article of commerce, if there are balances of trade against us, and foreign creditors will not receive in payment our corn and flour and cotton, let them have our bullion and welcome. Having no use for it ourselves as a currency, it would be cheap, and we can part with it without producing panics or revolutions or disturbing our own measures of value.

If importations are excessive those engaged in foreign trade only would suffer. One of the indispensable requisites of a safe, uniform circulating medium is that it should be inexportable. In no other way can we avoid being at the mercy financially of every political or monetary disturbance in Europe.

If the Bank of England raises the rate of interest on money, draws a few millions of gold from New York, our great commercial center, discounts are immediately contracted throughout the country, business is deranged, failures occur, the products of the farm, manufactory, and workshop depreciate, labor is thrown out of employment, and tens of thousands of men of enterprise are ruined. This state of things has been brought about more than once by this very cause. These calamities which have produced distress and misery to the remotest cabin in the land have been attributed to short crops, excessive production, overtrading—in short, to everything but the true cause. It is absurd—it is more, it is a crime—for a nation competent to manage its own affairs to so legislate as to leave the industry, prosperity, and welfare of this great people at the mercy of the money kings, stock-jobbers, and gold gamblers of Europe. Thus it will ever be with an exportable money.

To have a staple and uniform currency it should be inexportable, and yet a legal tender for the payment of every debt, public and private, within the limits of our national jurisdiction. To prove the instability and unreliability of gold as a currency we will refer to a fact mentioned in the President's last message. He says "the aggregate product of precious metals in the United States from 1849 to 1867 was $1,174,000,000, while for the same period the exports of specie were $741,000,000." He estimates the entire specie in the country now at $300,000,000. This furnishes the beggarly sum of about seven dollars per capita to supply the immense requirements of forty million people scattered over a continent engaged in vast enterprises and in developing boundless resources—a sum much smaller than is required of each individual annually for the payment of national taxes alone.

If gold and silver are insufficient in quantity and unstable and unreliable as a circulating medium how much more unreliable is a paper currency based upon a metallic coinage, and especially when the volume of paper money is increased five or ten fold beyond the amount of coin available for its redemption? A bank note promising to pay gold is a cheat and deception. It answers a very good purpose as long as payment is not demanded, and is tolerable only because a poor currency is better than none. If the gold is withdrawn by foreign demand, or the holders of any considerable amount of its issues present them for redemption, the bank necessarily closes its doors. It is not possible that a currency legalized as representing coin, when there is not a dollar in coin for every promise to pay a dollar, can be stable, uniform, and adequate to the purposes of exchange and payments. The oft-repeated experiments, with their disastrous failures, demonstrate that paper money based on coin is a fraud and swindle. As the value of money is wholly extrinsic from the material of which it is coined, and is purely legal or representative, it should be made of some substance that is cheap, portable, light, and not easily counterfeited. As a deed for a farm written on paper is just as good as if on parchment or as if engraved on a plate of gold, so a piece of paper which the Government has stamped and declared to be ten dollars, and which it will receive in payment of taxes or duties, and which is a legal tender for ten dollars, will buy a barrel of flour as well as a gold eagle. The latter is more valuable for watch cases and rings, but as money they are of equal legal value. The yardstick is a measure of length and it is of no moment what its material is if it is three feet long. A pound weight is a measure of quantity, and if it weighs a pound who cares whether its material is gold, iron, or lead? A dollar is a measure of value, and if stamped by national authority, and is at all times worth a dollar in the purchase of property, in payment of taxes and debts of every kind, it may be made of gold, silver, paper, or any other convenient substance. Treasury certificates such as are proposed by my bill being a legal tender for all purposes, would constitute a uniform and stable currency, and, like gold, would be redeemed in any property for sale within the limits of the Republic. When a person wishes to travel abroad or purchase goods in other countries he must provide himself with whatever commodities he can best exchange for the legal tender of the country to which he goes; it may be the productions of the farm, the manufactory, or the mine. Our Government does not and cannot guaranty that its gold and silver coinage will be received in exchange or payment outside its own jurisdiction. Treasury certificates coined by the Government would be a fixed, uniform, adequate, stable, permanent, safe, inexportable national currency, and being secured upon the entire property of the nation would be an unexceptionable legal tender while the Government endures.

While the legal value of a gold dollar is always the same, the sudden withdrawal of one half the amount in circulation by foreign demand reduces the exchangeable values of all the products of labor, involving producers in a loss which they could not sustain with an equal, uniform, inexportable currency. What we desire is but one currency, and that based upon the entire national wealth, which is substantial, and not upon a few millions of gold, which of all earthly things is the most unstable, shifting, and evanescent. When the legal-tender or greenback law was passed many who voted for it did so only because the emergencies of the hour demanded it, and with a full conviction that on the restoration of peace a return to the old order of things would be possible. The people acquiesced for the same reason, although they had so often suffered from irredeemable bank issues that they had strong prejudices against all kinds of paper money. The greenback, though imperfect in form, has educated the people to believe that a paper money can be made as safe as gold, and adequate to the demands of internal trade and commerce; a money of undoubted credit, which will expand and contract with the expansion and contraction of trade. They believe that with an ample supply of such money it would not be in the power of gold gamblers, bankers, and usurers to make currency plenty or scarce as their cupidity might dictate. Middle men who have capital could not so readily form "rings" and determine what price the farmer should receive for his produce, and what the consumer should pay for the necessities of life.

The fundamental mistake in the legal-tender act was that greenbacks were not receivable for custom duties and for all other purposes. These exceptions have placed the Government and people too much at the mercy of Wall street, that great national gambling hell, which should be cleaned out as effectually as Christ emptied the ancient temple of gold gamblers. This cleansing process would be effected by making gold in law what it is in fact, a commodity.

By the provisions of my bill national bank notes are called in and canceled and their places necessarily supplied with actual money. This disposes of those despotic institutions, which are a powerful element in controlling elections in the interest of capitalists. The despotism of an organized money power is as cruel and inexorable as was ever African slavery.

By the withdrawal of the national bank currency, and the immediate payment of the bonds now redeemable in lawful money, the volume of currency would not be as great as when the contraction scheme was inaugurated, and would then be insufficient for the absolute needs of productive industry. When other bonds are redeemable pay them in the same manner, or if the holders prefer give them other bonds drawing an interest of not more than three per cent., and convertible into lawful money on presentation at the Treasury. The money should in like manner be convertible into bonds in sums of not less than $100. This convertibility principle will give that elasticity or flexibility to the circulation which banks of issue are supposed to give. When there is a plethora of currency, a supply beyond the requirements of business, it will be changed into interest-bearing bonds, and at seasons of the year when wheat, corn, cotton, tobacco, and other productions are to be exchanged the bonds would be converted into money. Will any member on this floor undertake to say that a currency based upon the entire wealth of the nation, receivable for all purposes as a legal tender, and which can be converted in an hour into an interest-bearing security, will or can depreciate?

By this convertibility clause and fixing the rate of interest Congress will perform an imperative constitutional duty which it has never undertaken to discharge, namely, "regulate the value of money."

The value of money is determined by the rate of interest which it accumulates. The rate of interest on money determines what proportion of the joint earnings of capital and labor shall go to each. As capital is only accumulated labor, it is plain that if it receives a greater interest than the increase of wealth by production, labor is robbed of its just reward, and is in a state of vassalage. Taking agriculture as a safe basis of calculation, it will be found that our national wealth has increased in a long series of years a fraction over three per cent. per annum compounded. This enables us to fix a rate of interest which labor can pay without exhaustion. The interest which money commands determines the rent which the poor man must pay, and the wages he must receive for his labor.

At the present time, the Government being a borrower of money at an interest largely in excess of the growth of wealth by productive industry, and thereby fixing a still higher rate of interest on capital not invested in Government bonds, the results are that no houses for laborers are being built, but they are being crowded closer and closer together in uncomfortable apartments at exorbitant rents. Few men will be guilty of the financial folly of erecting tenements for workmen, or building manufacturing factories, or opening up farms, when they can make more by putting their surplus in bonds and be relieved from the annoyance of superintending employes, paying taxes and insurance, and collecting rents. If money is scarce and high the farmer gets less for his produce, the laborer receives less wages and pays more for his bread, because the intervening capitalist determines what the producer shall receive and the consumer pay. Rows of stone-front buildings in our cities are oftener evidences of how labor has been swindled out of its honest dues than of the frugality and industry of their own owners.

With money at a rate of interest corresponding to the growth of wealth by production, overgrown fortunes without labor would be few. Those who sow will reap, and many of those who are living by their wits will be turned into manufactories and workshops and upon farms to earn their bread by their own labor.

The system proposed by my bill cannot be controlled by capitalists. The machine is self-regulating, and could not be run by banks but by the people. They determine for themselves whether or not there is an ample supply of money. With our boundless undeveloped resources, our rapidly increasing population, our many young States and others in embryo rapidly maturing, who can doubt that every five-twenty and ten-forty bond will be needed in money as soon as redeemable. Thus an overtaxed and an unequally-taxed people will be delivered from bondage, and the army of tax-gatherers, informers, and spies, many of them fattening upon spoils obtained by dishonest practices, can be mustered out of service.

I see no other way out of our financial difficulties except by repudiation, and every honest man shudders at the idea of such a dread alternative. Peace has its necessities as well as war, and he gives evidence of insanity who believes that such a debt as ours, contracted in a paper currency, will be paid in coin. The claim of the holders of the five-twenty bonds that they must be paid in gold, is unjust, dishonest, and insolent, and if persisted in will peril their whole debt by weakening the sense of moral obligation on the part of those who by hard labor must pay the national indebtedness.

By the plain provisions of the law the five-twenty bonds are payable in legal-tender notes, and to ask payment in gold is to treat the law as a nullity, and set an example of bad faith and lawlessness, which an outraged people will not be slow to follow. If we take the estimates of the expenses of the different departments of the Government for the ensuing year, including interest on the public debt, pensions, &c., and compare these with the probable amount to be realized from tariff and internal revenue laws, the result will not be very encouraging to the advocates of resumption of specie payments and gold bonds.

If greenbacks sustained our armies in the field, enabled the Government to crush out a gigantic rebellion and overthrow African slavery, may not the lessons we have learned enable us to inaugurate a monetary system which will emancipate labor from the cruel exactions and tyranny of capital, and make white as well as black men free. By the adoption of this system we shall be an independent people, and stand unshaken and undisturbed by the political and financial convulsions of Europe. We will so stimulate production and open up new and profitable fields of enterprise that, with or without tariff laws, we will soon call upon other countries to settle their balances with us.

Now is the auspicious time to establish an American monetary system. Oppressed with an enormous debt; our resources taxed to the utmost limit to defray the ordinary expenses of Government and accruing interest; our coin largely exported; no State or local banks to supply an inferior currency; with a net work of national banks which are, happily, liable to destruction by the very law creating them; with a high appreciation of the value of greenbacks as a legal tender—all these things contribute to make this the favorable opportunity to wipe out the monarchical theories of gold and silver, originate a system that will destroy money monopolies, have a circulating medium made by the people and for the people, and limited only by the necessities of the people.

Neither the Bank of England, nor the moneyed monopolies of our own country, nor the States, nor any other power at home or abroad will be permitted longer to "regulate the value of money," a duty imposed upon Congress by the Constitution. Let us have done with British theories of political economy, the monarchical standard of money and the aristocratic definitions and notions of wealth. Let us rid ourselves of a paper circulation on the mis-called specie basis, for the history of such a currency is a history of instability, uncertainty, demoralization, fraud, bankruptcy, disgrace, and ruin. Give the people an ample currency stamped by national authority as money, based upon national wealth, convertible into three per cent. bonds, and they are self-reliant and independent, and the scepter which the money power relentlessly wields over labor is broken, and the commercial value of a free white man will rise to that at least of a black slave before the war.

The average earnings of our workmen beyond a subsistence is not $100 per annum. The owner of a United States bond of $1,000 owns the service of a "white slave," and this is about one half the value of an able-bodied negro eight years ago. The laboring masses North and South, black and white, must remain in a state of practical serfdom, with enormous taxation eating out their substance and crushing out their manhood, and bondholders, bankers, and Shylocks extorting their last cent unless the principles I have advocated be embodied in our financial policy. From the promptness and unanimity with which Congress passed the funding bill at the close of the last session, by which it was proposed to convert all our currency bonds into others payable in gold at a distant day, exempt from all taxation, at a rate of interest greatly in excess of the increase of wealth by production, I conclude that this plan will meet with little favor here. Thanks to the President of the United States, he withheld his signature, and that bill of abominations has not yet become a law. I think it can be shown that the productive industries of the country never can pay the interest and principal of such a funded debt in the manner proposed.

As I have already said, the national wealth has increased through a long period of years at an average of three and one third per cent. per annum compounded. I estimate our entire national wealth at $20,463,581,000, or about one fourth of that of both England and France. This sum compounded at three and one third per cent. per annum for fifty years will amount to $84,988,163,000, or a fraction more than the present estimated wealth of England and France. This estimate of our wealth embraces property of every kind, taxed and untaxed, including bonds. Funding our debt of $2,500,000,000 in bonds at four per cent. exempt from taxation for fifty years, (which is equivalent to seven per cent. bonds subject to taxation as other property,) and the interest on the public debt in the time specified will be $82,000,000,000, or within a small fraction of our then national wealth. Thus the bondholders would absorb the entire earnings of productive industry and own the entire property of the nation in a half century. Fund the debt at three per cent. per annum for the same time and it would bear the same proportion to the then wealth that it now does to our present wealth.

The cumulative power of money by interest is not sufficiently considered. Interest at six per cent. accumulates just four times as fast as at three per cent., while at ten per cent. it increases more than eleven times as fast as at three. For example, the interest on $1,000 at three per cent. is the first year thirty dollars; the interest on the accumulation the second year is ninety cents. The interest on the same sum at six per cent. is sixty dollars, and the interest on the accumulation is $3 60; the interest at ten per cent. is $100, and the interest on the accumulation the second year ten dollars. These examples illustrate how labor is robbed in paying exorbitant rates of interest to capital, and also show the utter impracticability of paying the national debt in the manner proposed by the funding bill. There are distinguished statesmen who declare that the general paralysis of the industries of the country now prevailing will be relieved by resuming specie payments and by getting rid of the legal-tender notes in circulation, the only means we have of paying taxes or anything else.

From the clamors of capitalists, stock and bond and gold brokers, and Peter-Funk agents of the Treasury, who are urging the conversion of currency bonds into gold bonds, we may expect any plan for the relief of the people to be ridiculed and denounced. We shall hear about the plighted faith of the Government, the nation's honor, worthless paper money, irredeemable currency, gold and silver the only money known to the world, Christian bankers, patriotic capitalists generously supplying the nation with the sinews of war, repudiation, and resumption of specie payments. Believing, as I do, that the five-twenty bonds never can and never should be paid in gold, that it will be fair to Government creditors, that it involves no dishonor, that it is the only way of avoiding repudiation and national disgrace, and above all, that those who work God's nobility can be emancipated from slavery in no other way, I am prepared for whatever of reproach or obloquy may be in store for me.

The National Labor Union, of which I am proud to be a representative, numbering now over six hundred thousand voters and daily increasing, is in full sympathy with the views I have expressed. The workmen are beginning to understand this mystified subject of finance, and, although attached to our respective political parties the charmed words "Union man" and "Democrat" will not seduce, nor the words "Radical" and "Copperhead" frighten us from our fixed and determined purpose to be heard and heeded in our demand for justice. We fought the battles of the war, and are toiling on the farm and in the workshop to pay the interest on the debt incurred. We are now, as then, loyal to the Government, and are now, as then, ready to maintain its integrity and honor. Without complaint we will pay out of our daily, weekly, or monthly earnings our just proportion of the public debt, but we will prefer repudiation to starvation. I caution bondholders, gold advocates, and their allies here and elsewhere not to press their unreasonable and unjust demands. We know full well that the reduction of the currency and a return to specie payments will enhance the value of the bonds by diminishing the wages of labor and by rendering the productive industries of the country less able to pay the taxes. We understand that the bondholder can hire two men and buy two barrels of flour instead of one with his interest if a gold standard is attained. We are fully aware that all who owe anything on the tools of their trade, or on their houses or farms; in short, all who are in debt to the amount of one third of their property will be made bankrupt. To assume that the taxpayers will acquiesce in the bondholders' policy is to presume either that they do not know their rights or that they have not the manhood and courage to maintain them.

One of our astute financiers and able statesmen thinks that the workmen of the nation are interested in our getting back to a gold basis as soon as possible. He says:

"Bring us at once to a hard-money basis and there will be a tumble in prices and more ease for the laboring classes in securing the necessities of life. The poor man can buy nearly twice as much with a gold as he can with a paper dollar."

The honorable gentleman fails to tell us where the poor man is to get the gold dollar. He fails to state that the taxes levied upon the articles he consumes remain the same as before; that the interest on his debt is as great as ever, while his resources for its payment are reduced one half; that the tax upon his tobacco is thirty-two cents per pound whether he earns two dollars per day or only one. There is nothing more aggravating and insulting to a poor man than to show him cheap provisions and no money to buy them and no employment. It cannot be denied that when our circulation was the largest laborers were better paid, procured the necessities of life more easily, paid their rent more promptly than at any time since the process of contraction commenced. The poor are always best off when money is abundant and cheap. The harvest for bankers, brokers, and usurers is when money is scarce and high. Those who are clamoring for resumption of specie payment and contraction of the currency may receive the indorsement of capitalists and bondholders, but they are sacrificing the interests of the productive classes.

It will be said that I require Government creditors to receive a money not known when the debts were contracted. To this I reply that Government creditors are no better than other creditors, and the question has been already settled by solemn decision of courts that creditors must receive greenbacks in payment of debts contracted when gold and silver were the only money known to the law. The proposed Treasury certificates being legalized as money for all purposes, and convertible into interest-bearing bonds, must be better than greenbacks, and the bondholders purchased their securities in these when greatly depreciated. Imperfect paper money saved our nation from being disintegrated by civil war, as it saved England during her war with France. Let it be remembered that from 1797 to 1819, when England had no money but irredeemable bank paper, she was financially more prosperous than at any other period in her history. During that long period gold and silver money was obsolete, the Bank of England furnishing the only currency of the empire. Yet labor was better paid, there was less of poverty and distress, and all the interests of productive industry were better secured than at any other time before or since. There was not, during that twenty-two years of suspension of specie payments, a monetary crisis, a financial panic, want of employment or of proper remuneration. When the gold tyrant was again enthroned everybody was a sufferer except the moneyed aristocracy.

"No single measure ever produced so disastrous an effect as that has done. It has added at least a third to the national debt, and augmented in a similar proportion all private burdens in the country, while it has taken as much from the remuneration of labor and means of paying it enjoyed by the community."

This lesson of history should not be forgotten. Shall we repeat this folly in our own experience? That this representation of the state of affairs in England will be true to the letter in this country if the resumption policy prevails will not admit of a doubt. Those who shall bring such a calamity upon the people will learn that "the ballot-box is stronger than an army."

The greenback was the almighty arm of our deliverance in war, and an absolute paper money, as a great wealth-distributing instrument, a symbol and representative of value, will be found equally valuable in peace. With a legal-tender money, endowed by Congress with the functions of measuring, representing, exchanging, and accumulating value by interest, sufficient in volume to answer the requirements of business, determinable by the rate of interest which it commands, convertible into three per cent. bonds, and the laboring millions, black and white, North and South, will be free. Let us be wise in time to prevent repudiation!

It has been estimated that four hours' labor by those engaged in productive industry is sufficient for the mere support of our whole population, and that all their production in their remaining hours of toil is surplus. Who shall have this surplus? It should be equitably distributed between labor and capital. This division can be effected only by a circulating medium at a just rate of interest. Now the fruits of six out of the ten hours of labor are swallowed up in the payment of taxes and in interest paid to capital, leaving nothing to those who earn all. If the working classes can have time for mental and moral improvement and true social enjoyment they will invent new methods and improve old ones for multiplying the comforts and blessings of life. By new discoveries and inventions they will subdue all the elements of nature and make them lay their trophies at the door of every cabin and palace of earth. Then will the sublime but hitherto rejected truth be acknowledged:

"The laboring man, whate'er his task,
To till the soil or raise the hod,
He wears upon his honest brow
The royal stamp and seal of God.
And brighter shines each drop of sweat
Than diamond in a coronet."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence between the Secretary of the Interior and the present Commissioner of Patents relative to supplies of stationery to the Patent Office, and the contracts for the same; and also copies of orders by the Secretary appointing committees to examine and report upon such contracts and supplies, together with all reports of such committees thereupon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 739) to incorporate the Somes's Patents Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. I am requested by the mayor and citizens to introduce this bill. I do not know anything about it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 740) for the relief of Robert B. Kingsbury, late internal revenue collector for the second district of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOHN YOUNG'S PATENT.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 704) to extend the letters-patent originally granted to John Young, which has been reported from the Committee on Patents. I think it will create no debate. The report of the committee is very brief. I will send it to the Clerk to be read, and it will explain the entire case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to extend the letters-patent granted to John Young on the 19th of September, 1848, and reissued to him July 30, 1861, for the term of seven years from and after the 19th of September, 1869, and directs the Commissioner of Patents to make a certificate of such extension and append the same to the original reissue or any copy thereof.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. FERRY from the Committee on Patents on the 18th of December last:

John Young, in the year 1848, obtained a patent for "an improvement in washing machines." The improvement consisted in the substitution of India-rubber for other material in the construction of such machines. Owing to his inability to perfect the vulcanizing of India-rubber during the existence of his original patent, he received but $1,600 during that period of fourteen years. In 1861 he succeeded in obtaining properly vulcanized rubber, and in 1862 his patent was extended by the Commissioner of Patents. He has received substantial benefit from his invention only during the six years which have elapsed since the renewal by the Commissioner, and has received but $5,000 for that period. He has really had the benefit of his invention since its renewal. The invention is new and valuable. His patent expires in September, 1869, and he asks an extension by Congress. His petition comes within the spirit of the patent laws, and the committee recommend that it be granted by the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know but that there is as much merit in this as in any case of a second renewal; but I am quite opposed to the renewal for the second time of any patent, and I hope we shall not establish a precedent for the renewal of any patent more than once.

Mr. FERRY. It is too late, Mr. President, to speak of establishing a precedent for the renewal of any patent, as the precedent has been established by repeated renewals for a long series of years. The principle upon which the present Committee on Patents have acted has been, that unless an application for a renewal is really brought by the facts of the case within the spirit of the existing patent laws, they would report against such renewal by act of Congress. In this case, during the whole existence of the original patent, a period of fourteen years, the inventor did not succeed in perfecting his invention for practical use on account of the difficulty of vulcanizing the material which constituted the main improvement in the invention. During six years only has he really received the benefit afforded by the existing patent laws for his invention. Under these circumstances we thought that the case, as the report states, fell within the spirit of the law, and therefore reported in favor of granting the application.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator inform us whether this patent embraces a process for vulcanizing rubber?

Mr. FERRY. It does not.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the materiality, then, of the statement which I understand the Senator to make that the patentee was unable to produce rubber properly vulcanized?

Mr. FERRY. He was unable to procure properly vulcanized rubber during the original existence of the patent, and unless it was properly vulcanized the machine was not of practical benefit to the extent which it has since become. By the perfection of the vulcanizing process, by other patentees I suppose, under the patents which have been issued for that process, he now is able to purchase of them rubber which accomplishes the entire object he had in preparing this machine.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the language of the report is calculated somewhat to mislead those who read it.

Mr. FERRY. It may be so.

Mr. CONKLING. The language is: "owing to his inability to perfect the vulcanizing of India-rubber."

Mr. FERRY. Perhaps that expression is improper. It should properly be, "to procure properly perfected vulcanized rubber."

Mr. CONKLING. So that the patent does not embrace any process for dealing with rubber?

Mr. FERRY. Nothing whatever. It is simply the application of rubber properly vulcanized to this machine for washing.

Mr. CONKLING. As I rose to ask a question, I will avail myself of the occasion to make one remark on this case. Like the Senator from Vermont, I am very averse to a vote in any ordinary case directing the renewal of a patent; and yet I know that there are numerous cases falling, in the phrase of the Senator from Connecticut, within the spirit of the patent laws where such an extension may properly be directed. It would seem to me, however—and to this remark I invite the attention of the Senator from Connecticut—that it must be a very extraordinary case which would demand the exercise of this legislative discretion in favor of the original inventor, he not having died before he realized substantial benefit—in favor of the original inventor who has survived the lifetime of his original patent and of one extension of that patent, particularly where the patent applies to an article such as a sewing-machine or a variety of other articles by which I might illustrate it.

Mr. DIXON. This is a washing-machine.

Mr. CONKLING. This is, as the Senator says, a washing-machine—as I understand it, a machine for wringing clothes; but I speak of a sewing-machine as somewhat analogous—a machine used by the many, used by the poor, used in families; a machine, in short, which goes to give rest to human muscles and to lessen manual labor. It seems to me that in the case of such an invention a man who has outlived his patent and outlived the extension of his patent, ought to show a case of peculiar merit or peculiar hardship in order to be entitled to invoke this intervention by Congress.

Mr. FERRY. I feel no particular interest in the present case any further than the investigation before the committee developed the fact that owing to circumstances outside of the control of the inventor he failed to reap any pecuniary benefit from his invention during the first fourteen years of the existence of his patent, and that therefore he has really had the benefit of our patent laws only since the extension of his patent by the Commissioner. Therefore, it seemed to us to be a case which would fall within the principle laid down by the Senator from New York, as a case in which Congress might rightly and justly renew the patent again, the inventor having, by circumstances beyond his control, not derived the benefit from it to which he was justly entitled.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I remember very well since I have been a member of the Senate that this question of the extension of patents was once before the Senate and discussed very fully, at a time, I believe, when Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, was upon that committee. The question whether the Commissioner of Patents should have any power to extend patents was discussed, and finally on full discussion it was decided that no such power should be given to the Commissioner, and it was arranged that a patent when issued should be issued for seventeen years, and that there should be no renewals. That was the result of the judgment at which the Senate arrived at that time, and, I think, for very good reasons. If for seventeen years a patentee has an opportunity to reap the benefit of his patent, it is enough. We know, sir, the pressure which may be brought to bear, not only upon the Commissioner of Patents, but upon Congress, to procure the renewal of some of these great and valuable patents. This patent of a machine for the wringing of clothes, which is used in almost every household in the land, is a patent which may perhaps be worth $500,000 if it is to be extended. The person who invented it had the benefit of his patent for fourteen years; it was then renewed, and the honorable Senator from Connecticut says the reason why the person did not reap the benefit of his patent during the first fourteen years of its existence grew out of the fact that in the present state of the arts vulcanized rubber could not be produced which would serve the necessary purpose of this material in being used in his machine. In short, for the first fourteen years his machine was a failure. But, considering all this, if the patent has once under the laws then existing been extended for six or eight years, in my judgment that is enough. It would be a dangerous precedent for Congress to interfere on grounds so slight as these, in the extension of this patent, which may involve perhaps millions of dollars. I shall not discuss the question at length, but content myself with voting against the bill and protesting against the policy of renewing these patents after they have run for a whole generation.

Mr. WILLEY. The facts in this case very fully sustain the report of the committee. I beg leave to state so much, as I could not myself concur in the report of the committee. As a member of the committee I was opposed to granting the privilege secured in the bill under consideration. It is very apparent that during the fourteen years, the first term of this patent, the patentee received very little compensation. The reason of it was that the roller or apparatus which he originally invented did not answer the purpose, because it absorbed the water and the dirt out of the clothing, and that was the case until some other person had invented the process of vulcanizing India-rubber; so that, in effect, the extension of this patent would be giving to this individual the advantage of another man's invention, in point of fact. Upon that ground I did not conceive that the case under consideration presented any very great claims to the clemency and consideration of Congress.

Besides, sir, I have taken it to be the sense of Congress, as referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin, that patents were not to be reissued; that parties were not to have the benefit of their monopoly over seventeen years except in cases of very peculiar hardship, and then Congress might renew them. The law, as it at present stands, takes away from the Commissioner of Patents the right to extend a patent, but it extends the original term from fourteen to seventeen years, leaving it wholly within the discretion of Congress whether there shall be any extension at all. But, sir, upon the ground that it was another man's invention which made the invention of this washing-machine at all valuable, I did not think myself that the case presented any very peculiar claims to the consideration of Congress, and therefore I was opposed to the extension granted in this bill, although the facts as stated in the report were very amply sustained by the testimony before the committee. There was a manufacturer before the committee who verified by his practical experience all the facts stated in this report. It was proved that this gentleman had not received any very considerable compensation for his invention, simply from the fact that the first term had nearly expired before he could avail himself of the use of another man's invention in vulcanizing India-rubber. Therefore, I was opposed to the extension of his patent.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I remember that we had a proposition for the extension of a patent before the Senate at the last session; I think in relation to some trifling improvement upon woolen machinery. It was a small affair, but a very great inconvenience to the manufacturers throughout the country, and it was rejected. My friend from Connecticut, I think, favored its rejection. Now, shall we use that kind of justice in favor of the rich manufacturers, and when a patent comes up here whose rejection is to benefit the poor women of the country, are we to treat it with favor? I call upon my friend from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY,] my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who are particularly distinguished for their zeal in defense of woman's rights, to stand up. Here is a question on which they can show their eloquence and their adherence to principle.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me that the extension of a patent of this kind is a premium on the lack of enterprise and imbecility of the parties who bring forward their claims for extension. I am utterly opposed either to the extension of patents by the Commissioner of Patents or by Congress in any case whatever. We have some cases of the most meritorious kind that come before us, and yet they are generally rejected. Take the case of Hoe's printing press, one of the most valuable inventions that have ever been produced in the country, and yet the Senate is averse, as I understand, to any extension of that patent. I suppose there are not less than five thousand models in the Patent Office of washing-machines, and if they were built of the usual size the Patent Office would be unable to contain them. This is unquestionably one of the most meritorious that has been invented, but it has had a monopoly for a sufficient length of time, and I hope the Senate will not grant the extension.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very manifest that the Senate is not in a disposition to pass this bill now. I will therefore move—

Mr. GRIMES. Let us get it out of the way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move to postpone it, with a view to take up another bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone the present bill with a view to take up Senate bill No. 554.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the present bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARTERING OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to take up the bill I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 554) to promote commerce among the States and to cheapen the transportation of the mails and military and naval stores.

The bill was read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] has no objection, I would rather say what I have to say in regard to this railroad bill to-day, and then let it go over until next Monday; but still, if he desires to go on with the bill, which is the regular order, I shall not interpose.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that we shall hear the Senator from Ohio on this bill, so that the case may be considered as opened.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not expect to press a vote to-day.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly I shall agree to forego the regular order for a short time under the circumstances. It may be laid aside informally, I suppose?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be passed over informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like very much to accommodate the honorable Senator from Ohio, but I think my colleague will find that if the debate is opened on this great question of building these railroads the speech of the Senator from Ohio may lead to debate; he will never reach his bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not propose to press the railroad bill to a vote now; but when I have said what I have to say in regard to it, to postpone it until Monday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the special order is passed over informally; and Senate bill No. 554 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this bill proposes to charter three railroad companies to construct railroads respectively from Washington to New York, Pittsburg, and Cincinnati. In presenting this bill the select committee did not deem it essential to accompany it with a written report, as numerous reports have been made on similar bills and the constitutional questions involved have been discussed since the formation of the Government.

In opening the argument I will content myself with stating the general reasons which induce me to support this bill, leaving to other members of the select committee the duty of stating their own views and replying to any objections of a legal or constitutional character that may be urged in opposition to it.

The questions involved are—

1. The necessity for new modes of railroad transit to and from Washington.

2. The extent of the power of Congress over existing railroads and its authority to construct new roads.

First. As to the necessity for new modes of railroad transit to and from Washington.

It is a remarkable fact that the only access from the North, East, or West to Washington is by one railroad, and that a feeder or branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

There are now in the United States over forty thousand miles of railway, and nearly every city or town of importance has the advantage of competing lines, and not one approaching the population of Washington but has several of these great avenues of travel and transportation. This marked isolation of Washington becomes more striking when we consider it as the political capital of a country of thirty-six million souls, thousands of whom are compelled by public business and duties to visit it, and most of whom naturally desire to visit it as the seat of all the great Departments of the Government. Our constituents, where ever they reside, expect that their capital should be accessible to all by the best modes of transit enjoyed by other cities, and that this transit should be as direct, cheap, and convenient as possible. The demand for such means of transit comes to us with most force from those who reside in the District of Columbia. They are mainly the workmen or agents of the Government, or those who furnish them supplies. They must depend entirely upon Congress for the facilities of travel and transportation. Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over all matters in this District, and this authority involves the duty to secure them modes of transit equal to those enjoyed by other cities within the jurisdiction of a State. Has this duty been performed? Is the access to Washington such as is commensurate with the importance of this city as the home of one hundred thousand persons or as the political capital of the United States? Is the branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad a reasonably sufficient agency to transport all those whose business or pleasure calls them here and the supplies necessary for their maintenance? The Baltimore and Ohio railroad is a corporation created by the State of Maryland over which the people of this District have no control. Its main line and branches are five hundred and thirteen miles long, and it leases and controls other railroads probably of an equal length. Its operations extend to and through several States. The latest report we have of its operations is for 1865. By this report it then employed two hundred and forty-three locomotives and three thousand six hundred and thirteen cars. It gross earnings in that year were $11,771,876. It may be properly classed as one of the great railroads of the United States. It has been managed with ability, and its influence is felt not only in Maryland but in connecting lines with Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis. It competes with rival lines for the business of nearly one fourth the population of the United States, and it has the substantial monopoly of that of the District of Columbia. Like other corporations its chief motive is self-interest. Its great object is, first, the profit of its owners; second, the commercial interests of the city of Baltimore; and third, the convenience of the people of Maryland. It has no motive to promote the local interests of Washington, except as the business done here increases its revenues. Every regulation of the company makes Baltimore the chief terminal point to or near which every person traveling and every article carried over their road must go. All freight to Washington pays the charges to Baltimore superadded to those from Baltimore to Washington, and the delay at Baltimore is constantly complained of. Though Washington is one great source of its business, it gives in return but little to the local taxes or interests of Washington.

It has greatly contributed to the growth and prosperity of Baltimore. By traversing the whole length of Maryland it furnishes the citizens of that State excellent facilities of transit. It depends for its corporate powers upon the Legislature of Maryland, and may, if it abuses its powers or neglects its duties, be called to account by the people of Maryland. That it obeys its obligations to Maryland is shown by the fact that by the acquiescence of the Legislature it possesses a substantial control of the railroad traffic of that State. It pays to that State enormous taxes, and is one of the chief agencies of its wealth and prosperity. Mr. Garrett, the president of the road, in his recent address, very truly boasts of the beneficial effect of this policy to the interests of Baltimore and Maryland. He says:

"This system has enabled you to expend, under the present administration, after making moderate dividends, more than fifteen million dollars to perfect your road with double tracks, with iron bridges, and the requisite machinery and buildings; to aid in opening the line through the Washington county road to the Cumberland valley of Pennsylvania, through the Winchester and Potomac road to the valley of Virginia, through the Parkersburg road to the Ohio river and to Marietta and Cincinnati, and through Bellaire and the Central Ohio road to Columbus, thus connecting also with numerous radiating lines from great centers of railway improvements. It has enabled you, too, to organize—thus advancing the interests of all regions with which you are connected—lines of ocean steamships to Liverpool and to Bremen, and to assist in establishing lines of steamships between the leading cities upon the southern coast and Baltimore. By economy and prudence and persistent energy this vast sum has been expended, enhancing and developing grand public interests without any strain upon the finances of the State or city, and these expenditures have produced rapidly, and with almost magic power, the largest reactive and most beneficial fruits."

But this road bears no such relation to the people of the District of Columbia. To the latter it is simply a monopoly imposing its own terms, including a tax on each person and on all property transported to Washington, but paid to the State of Maryland. It is a monopoly in that it prevents all rival lines, and indeed every means of railroad transit from the residence of three fourths of the people of the United States to Washington, except over their road. Capitalists and rival interests would have built other railroads to Washington long since, and the only obstruction is this railroad, which has thus far defeated all competition and has monopolized on its own terms the railroad transit to Washington.

A power like this in a single corporation, however wisely exercised, would in time cause serious dissatisfaction. It is inconsistent with the general good of the States and the people, which opposes monopoly and invites free competition. Liberty to devise and employ new agencies of commerce, to build new roads and improve existing roads, is necessary to secure the just exercise of corporate rights. It is, therefore, natural that dissatisfaction should occur with the present exclusive transit, even if it yielded only a fair profit on the capital employed and furnished direct, convenient, and cheap communication.

But we find—

1. That the profit of the Washington branch is grossly out of proportion to the cost of the branch.
2. That it is not a direct route except to Baltimore.
3. That it is not a convenient route, but denies the usual facilities of travel except to Baltimore.
4. That it is not a cheap route, but, though very profitable, is more expensive than any similar short line, and is used to levy for the State of Maryland an unconstitutional tax.

First. The profit of the Washington branch compared with its cost.

The latest return to which I have had access is the report for the year 1865. From this, as stated in Poor's Manual of Railroads, it appears that this branch is thirty miles long, extending from Washington to Relay House, Maryland, where it meets the main line. The gross earnings for 1865 were $916,287, or over $30,000 a mile. The expenses of operating it were $865,294, and the net profits were $550,992, or equivalent to ten per cent. on a capital stock of $5,500,000.

I have not a statement of the cost of this branch, but from the comparatively easy grades, road-bed, and curvature, estimate that $50,000 a mile, or $1,500,000, would replace the road at the present high prices. The route presents no engineering difficulties, and with the exception of the bridge near the main stem it requires no expensive bridges. The capital stock of this branch is stated at $1,615,000, and it has no debt. It thus appears that the gross earnings of this branch will nearly refund the stock in twenty months; that its net earnings will refund the stock in three years, and that the net earnings upon the stock in 1865 were thirty-three per cent. on its capital stock, and upon its estimated cost at present prices would exceed thirty-four per cent.

This enormous profit was divided between the stockholders and the State of Maryland—$165,000 or ten per cent. being paid to the stockholders, $244,187 to the State of Maryland, and the very large surplus revenue then accumulated, of $708,013, which was deposited with or loaned to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

It is manifest, from this statement, that a monopoly so productive to all the parties concerned will not be willingly yielded, however burdensome it may be to the people of the United States, and especially to so many of them as reside in this District.

Second. The directness of the road.

The general direction of the branch is to the northeast, and therefore furnishes a reasonably direct route to Baltimore, and thence to the northeast Atlantic border. To no other portion of the United States does it furnish a direct route. Passengers to the North, to Harrisburg, and the body of the States of New York and Pennsylvania are required to go to Baltimore and pursue their journey as hereinafter mentioned. The main stem of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad is from east to west. The direct route to those States crosses the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at right angles, and to the people of the West and Northwest the route is still more indirect. By a feasible and direct route to Pittsburg, the center of an existing system of railroads, the distance would be about three hundred miles, while by the present route via Wheeling it is four hundred and ninety-two miles, and via Harrisburg it is three hundred and seventy-four miles. The managers of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad have been authorized for years to build a branch of their road from Washington along the line of the Potomac to Harper's Ferry.

This branch would shorten the distance by their line to Harper's Ferry fifty miles, or from ninety-two miles to forty-two miles. But the fact that so powerful a company has not yet constructed this short branch, and has scarcely commenced it, is explained by the palpable reason that it is not their interest to construct it. Their interest is to prolong the travel over their main line, and if ever constructed by them it will be run subsidiary to their main line. Even now, under the pressure of threatened competition, we scarcely have a promise of its speedy completion. Mr. Garrett, in the address already quoted, says:

"A costly enterprise, largely for the benefit of the capital—the Metropolitan road—is in progress. You will remember that by this line the distance from the Point of Rocks to Washington is reduced from ninety-one to forty-two miles, and that by this expensive though very direct avenue the city of Washington will be placed in most advantageous relations with your entire system of improvements, which have cost more than $50,000,000. By this road, in connection with the Pittsburg and Connellsville line, the distance is reduced seventy-four miles from Pittsburg, and one hundred and twenty-eight miles from Cincinnati to Washington, as compared with the shortest lines to that city by the Pennsylvania road."

Thus, while admitting the palpable indirectness of the present route, its unprecedented profit, and the fact that they have expended $15,000,000 to improve their main line and extend its connections, he gives us but little encouragement for what he calls a "costly enterprise" and an "expensive but very direct avenue to Washington." And yet this short road of forty-two miles could be constructed in one year, and from the accrued profits of the Washington branch now loaned to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. Even when made it will not relieve the chief want of this District, namely, a competing route.

Third. The convenience of the present route.

By the rapid development of railroads in the United States certain facilities of transit are indispensable to the comfort and safety of travelers. These have been secured by the competition of rival lines, and where denied for any reason it is a just subject of complaint. But where this denial is based upon the avowed purpose of obstructing travel over other routes it becomes intolerable.

By the Baltimore and Ohio railroad a passenger to the East may, without change of cars by horse power, make a connection east of Baltimore; but who can doubt but that if free transit were allowed through Maryland that the necessity for this tedious process of transportation through Baltimore would be avoided? There are no physical difficulties in the way not easily overcome, so that the vast tide of travel from the Northeast to the South might pass by locomotive power near to and around Baltimore, as well as other great cities on the route. The danger of local obstruction in a great city ought to be avoided, especially when actual experience shows it to be constantly imminent.

A President of the United States, to the lasting disgrace of the nation, was compelled, by an organized plot of assassination, to steal through Baltimore at night in disguise. Soldiers duly summoned to the defense of the capital were murdered in the streets of Baltimore. For weeks the railroads in and near Baltimore were in the possession of an armed force in hostility to the United States, and the rolling stock and property of the only railroad to Washington were in the use of the public enemy. At the same time their use was denied to the Government of the United States. Recently an armed mob in the streets of Baltimore took possession of a train of cars and insulted passengers for political opinions. None of these outrages could have occurred if there were free competing railroad lines through and around Baltimore.

But the chief inconvenience of the present system falls upon the transit to and from the West. A passenger to the West has no choice of route in that direction. He must go eastwardly thirty miles toward Baltimore, and if he wishes then to go West he must change cars and take such seats as are unoccupied from Baltimore. If he chooses some other route to the West, he must pursue his journey eastwardly to Baltimore, and then commence a new journey. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad will not connect with the only road from Baltimore to the North. It will not transfer baggage or sell tickets over or to that route. The time tables are arranged to create delay in Baltimore; a rough omnibus or carriage ride across the city one mile, with a scramble for baggage at either end of the transit, are unreasonable, inconvenient, and expensive, but they must be endured. The tracks of the two roads actually meet and connect, but the transfer is not made at the point of connection, and there can be no reason for this except the hostility of rival companies—the desire to force the western travel over the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and the fact that passengers are utterly helpless to correct the evil. Tens of thousands of passengers have passed through this experience; many ladies and sick persons have suffered severely. In cold and heat, by day and by night, this antiquated system of transfer goes on. It is estimated that the delay and expense of this transit through Baltimore has already exceeded the cost of a new line from Baltimore to Washington. If this inconvenience could fall upon the citizens of Maryland it would not have been endured, for they could correct it; but all the passengers compelled to undergo this transit are traveling beyond the limits of Maryland, and thus have no remedy unless Congress can give them one. It has been complained of here and everywhere, but the only reply is that it is not the policy of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to make this connection. Recently, it is said, efforts have been made to reconcile the petty rivalries and jealousies of these roads, but it is not done, and will not be done until competition compels them to regard the convenience and comfort of their passengers. Even when the transit is made at Baltimore the passenger is further from his place of destination than when he started from Washington, and yet this is the only mode by which a citizen can travel between Washington and the Northwest except by the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, which does not and cannot make his connections.

The same inconvenience occurs in the transportation of supplies to Washington. Its citizens depend mainly on the West for many essential articles. These can only be transported by one route, and therefore from many if not all the cities of the West and Northwest the cost of transportation is greater to Washington than to New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, while Washington is nearer the common source of supply than either of these cities. This want of competition in transportation is an essential element of the high cost of living in Washington, and contributes to the demand so often made and granted for increased salaries.

Fourth. The cost of travel and transportation to Washington is greater than the same distance on other roads. The charge is $1 50 for forty miles, or nearly four cents a mile. This is greater per mile than the charge on the main line—a far more expensive road; but the main line competes with rival lines, while the Washington branch does not. The tax levied by Maryland on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad is mainly levied upon the branch. It is about $250,000 per annum for thirty miles, or $8,000 a mile—a higher tax than the average gross receipts of the railroads of the United States. A similar tax levied on the three thousand four hundred miles of railroad in Ohio would yield $27,000,000, or several times the aggregate revenue of that State. The statements already given show that a mileage of two cents, or eighty cents between Baltimore and Washington, would on the present travel yield a handsome profit, while it would largely increase the travel and traffic on the road; but this can scarcely be hoped for when nearly half of the net receipts must be paid the State of Maryland as taxes.

The rates for transportation are also much higher than on other railroads, and these rates are superadded to the reasonable through rates of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. The following remarkable statements were made in a report recently adopted by a public meeting of citizens of Washington:

"The Washington branch of that road was built under an act of the Maryland Legislature of 1830 and an act of Congress of 1831; by both of which acts transportation, freight, and passenger rates are limited; but the legal limits are, nevertheless, entirely disregarded by that corporation."

"As an example of the character of the charges for transportation, we have had our attention called to the case of a merchant here who shipped hardware from England; the ocean charges for three thousand miles were less than the railroad freight and charges in and from Baltimore to Washington, thirty-nine miles. Another recent case shows that the charges from Chicago to Baltimore on a parcel of freight (all the way by rail) were less than the charges in and from Baltimore to Washington. We also find that freights are taken from Baltimore to points in Virginia, and from places in Virginia to Baltimore, passing through Washington, at less rates than to and from Washington."

The statements here made, if accurate, demand at once a repeal of the several acts authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to enter the District of Columbia. Their right to do so is based upon the act approved March 2, 1831. This act limits them "to the same rights, compensation, benefits, and immunities as are prescribed in their said charter." Since the passage of this act their charter has been repeatedly altered by the Legislature of Maryland and the rates of charges greatly enlarged; but these changes cannot increase the rates in the District of Columbia without the consent of Congress. And yet, without such consent, the increased rates allowed by Maryland have been extended to Washington.

Full charges for freight were exacted from the United States without abatement during the war, while all other roads did lower their rates to the Government, and on United States troops the charge was one dollar to one dollar and ten cents.

At the very time the United States was defending Maryland from invasion by the rebels she charged the United States a tax of thirty cents on each soldier who traveled over this road to her protection. The amount thus collected from the United States far exceeded the entire cost of building and running a new road to Baltimore.

It is thus apparent that the railroad transit to Washington is neither direct, convenient, nor cheap, and that from the nature of the existing monopoly no remedy can be expected from the State of Maryland. That State commands every avenue of approach to Washington. It ceded to the United States this District as a national capital. This fact at common law implies a reasonable right of way over her remaining territory to the ceded territory. This is not granted. She obstructs free communication between the capital and the great body of the people. The inevitable tendency of this policy is to unsettle the continuance of the capital at this place. It is now far from the center of population, but its fine location on the Potomac, central between the North and South, the historical associations connecting it with General Washington, and the great expenditure incurred for public buildings, will secure the permanence of this location if direct, convenient, and cheap communication may be had to it from all parts of the country. One chief reason urged for this location was its easy access to the West by the old route of the Potomac and Monongahela and Ohio rivers. This is the great national route to the West—the route of the Indian trails—of the pioneers of Ohio and Kentucky, of Washington as a surveyor and soldier, and apparent on the map as the nearest and easiest connection between the waters of the Atlantic and the waters of the Upper Mississippi basin.

It is the route designated by Mr. Calhoun in his report as Secretary of War in 1824 as the route of highest importance, the improvement of which would do more than any other to bind together the three great geographical divisions of the United States. Apart from local interests it would be selected by any competent engineer.

When the Baltimore and Ohio railroad was built the interests of Baltimore and the Legislature of Maryland diverted this route from its natural course along the Potomac to Harper's Ferry eastward over a difficult country to Baltimore, while westward from Cumberland the local interests of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania prevented its construction to Pittsburgh and forced it over dangerous and difficult mountains to Wheeling. The same adverse local interests have been strong enough thus far to prevent this national route from being occupied. And thus the chief reason for locating the capital of the nation here has been counteracted, so that now this city is more difficult of access from the West than any city on the sea-board. If this anomaly is continued it will be impossible to resist the removal of the capital to a more central location, free from the danger of foreign and domestic violence, and where the policy of the neighboring States invites the freest and fullest competition in modes and routes of transit of persons and property.

The only remedy for all these complaints is free competition in the building and running of railroads to and from Washington. Where this is allowed no legislative restraints or regulations are required. If the surrounding States would adopt the general principle, now nearly universal west of the Alleghenies, of allowing any association to build a railroad wherever local or general interests demand, under general laws applicable to all alike, complaint would cease. The cost of railroads will prevent their unnecessary increase, and even where they are unprofitable as an investment they are greatly remunerative to the public by the development of resources. Railroads are never built except to make money for the stockholders, or to promote competition, or to promote the general interests of the locality. In any case they contribute far more to the general good than the inconvenience or loss they inflict on the individual. Railroads are vast agencies of commerce vitally necessary to modern civilization, and it is as wrong by law to limit the number of them as to limit by law the number of steamboats, cotton-mills, or blacksmith-shops.

Free competition in railroads is necessary in another view. The tendency of the age is to the combination of railroads—the union of connecting and competing lines with a view to prevent the reduction of fares. This process has within a few years, by leases, by divisions of profits, and by running arrangements, united in a single interest, under a common control, over one thousand miles of railroad, reaching through many States. The only way to avoid injury from this combination of capital is to invite new competing lines. The liberty to build these is the only check upon monopolies. But for this, existing railroads would form combinations precisely as they would be formed by merchants and manufacturers if the freedom of new competition did not compel them to gain their business and profit by the cheapness of their commodities and the excellence of their productions, rather than by special privileges.

A greater danger presents itself than mere combinations to regulate freight. It is the combination of great corporations to control Congress. A very marked example of this is presented by the effort of great corporations to oppose this bill. I will ask the Secretary to read a circular letter recently published.

PHILADELPHIA, December 26, 1868.

SIR: Two bills (Senate bills 554 and 681) are now pending before the Senate of the United States, each of which incorporates several companies, and authorizes them to build railroads, seven in all, radiating from Washington and extending over seven or eight different States. These bills confer very great powers and impose few restrictions. For example, one of them authorizes the construction of a road to any point on any railroad in Virginia.

It is well understood that this is but an entering wedge to a system of railroad legislation by Congress, intended to extend over every part of the country.

Believing that such congressional legislation will be destructive of existing railroad interests, promote wild and dishonest speculation, and be highly demoralizing in its influence, we call your especial and immediate attention to it.

Many of the corporations named in these bills—some of them officers of existing railroads—have never been consulted. This has given the impression that influential men and companies favor this legislation who in fact are strongly opposed to it.

Under the impression that no such bill can pass, railroad companies generally have not opposed the measure. Prominent Senators, however, say that the danger is great and imminent, and that it calls for immediate and vigorous exertions on the part of existing railroad officers to avert it.

Should this matter appear to you as it does to us, we suggest that you use your influence with your friends in Congress, especially in the Senate, to defeat all such measures.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the gentlemen whose names appear attached to this paper. They are among the ablest railroad managers in the United States. But, sir, if they make combinations of capital to prevent competition they must expect new competitors. They control powerful corporations, but these corporations are subject to law. They have no exclusive powers, and let me say to them, in all kindness, that this effort of theirs is ill-advised, and if persevered in will result in political combinations, both in the States and in Congress, that will override at once their efforts to prevent new railroads, new combinations, and improved facilities.

Experience has shown that free competition is not only beneficial to the public, but is not injurious to the railroads. A new railroad develops its own business; the reduction of prices caused by competition increases the amount of business, and often increases the net earnings of a road. Competition promotes economy in railroad management. It destroys corruption, which is usually an instrument of monopoly. In every aspect, and to every interest, a free competition in railroads is beneficial; it develops local resources, it increases subordinate industries, it cheapens the cost of living; while monopoly in railroads has the opposite tendency, and creates a feeling of dissatisfaction which in the end, without regard to legal enactments, will overthrow it.

Marked examples of this policy may be seen in different parts of the United States. Ohio commands every avenue of approach from the East to the West. Lake Erie bends into her northern boundary, while the hills of Kentucky obstruct railroads through her territory. By taxes or monopolies Ohio might have greatly obstructed free communication among the several States. She might have protected her grain markets from the competition of the West. She might have arranged her taxes so as to have levied them on the neighboring States. She adopted, however, the policy of free competition. Railroad charters were granted whenever desired, and finally a general railroad law allowed any association to build railroads anywhere upon regulations applicable to all alike. The result is the building of three thousand and four hundred miles of road, most of which is producing an actual profit to the stockholders, and every mile of which is of greater local benefit than the cost. New roads are being constructed, new competition created, until now cities of the smaller class build railroads merely to secure local competition. All the great lines from the Atlantic to the West are now competing in the different parts of Ohio for local business. They have extended their connecting arms in every direction. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad also avails itself of this policy and of the laws of West Virginia and Pennsylvania to improve and extend its connections. It now reaches with its connections to Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati and the Southwest. It wisely and ably competes with all the great lines from Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. This competition is in the interest of the people, and if left untrammelled by State monopolies will secure cheap transportation. Yet while this road extends its operations into the natural fields of other corporations it carefully guards its monopoly here. Its rivals are not allowed by the State of Maryland to compete here. Washington is excluded from the benefit of this healthy competition. The passenger from the West and Northwest may reach any city of the sea-coast from Portland to Baltimore by his own choice of competing lines, but he cannot approach Washington except through or near Baltimore, and then only by a branch of one of the great competing lines, which, in its public advertisements, declares as an inducement for traveling over its main line to the West that it will not allow the usual facilities in the transfer of passengers and baggage to other lines in that direction. Such a policy naturally produces resentment, which, if it can find no remedy in the power of Congress, will find it in the removal of the seat of Government.

I have thus far considered the question as a local one, affecting alone the citizens of Washington, or those coming to or going from Washington. There is another view far more important. The right of a State to obstruct commerce and communication between the States by imposing taxes on commerce, or by granting special privileges and monopolies, has often been denied in Congress and by the courts, and presents a question of infinitely greater proportions than the dwarfing of Washington or the cost and inconvenience of persons traveling to Washington. It is the same question which mainly led to the adoption of the Constitution, to the formation of the Zollverein of Germany, and to the formation of the present empires of France and Great Britain. It is the struggle between local restrictions and the liberty of commerce. The effort to harmonize this was attempted by the Constitution of the United States. Local government for local purposes is the primary object of cities, counties, and States; general government for general objects affecting the people of the nation was the object of the national Government.

The precise boundary between these must always be the subject of dispute; and this must especially occur where a specific power is given to both the States and the United States. The power over commerce is of this character: Congress has power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Here the power of Congress is only limited by the nature of the commerce. The power over local commerce between the citizens of a State is left exclusively to the States, but commerce among the States is to be regulated by Congress. Railroads are the agents both of local commerce and commerce among the several States. This creates the difficulty of defining the limits of the power of Congress and the States. Navigable streams, even if within the limits of a State, have been repeatedly held to be subject to the regulation of Congress. Unnavigable streams within the limits of a State are exclusively within the jurisdiction of a State. (Veazie vs. Moore, 14 Howard, 598.) States create railroads for local commerce. May not Congress create railroads for commerce among the States? States prescribe fare and freights for local commerce. May not Congress do the same for commerce among the States? This brings us to the general constitutional question involved in this and all the bills referred to the select committee: does the Constitution confer upon Congress the power by general regulations or by new corporations to control and build railroads?

The general design of the Constitution was to secure to Congress all legislative power affecting the interests of more than one State and essential to the general welfare. The powers reserved to the States, or not delegated to Congress, are such as affect solely the domestic interests and happiness of the people within the States. All questions of education, the domestic relations, of contracts, nearly all questions of municipal law, are reserved to the States, because they affect only the people of the State, and depend upon locality, wealth, density of population, the employment of the people, and a multitude of considerations properly to be judged of by the vicinage or State. But where the questions involved affect the people of other States the Constitution withholds their decision from local authority and intrusts them to Congress as the representatives of the whole people. Thus questions of peace or war, of armies and navies, of foreign intercourse, of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, are carefully reserved for the consideration of Congress. It may sometimes be difficult to draw the line between local commerce within the State and general commerce between the States, but there can be no difficulty in classifying the vast operations of modern railroads, telegraph, and transportation companies, reaching from State to State, as commerce among the States. Commerce between New York and Chicago, traversing several States, cannot be classed as local interstate commerce, nor is it made so by being carried on by different agents of the several States. Though chartered by different States, if they form a connecting line for a single voyage they are agents of a commerce between States, and are subject to the regulation of Congress. If, by the policy of their State or by local interests, they fail to conduct this commerce between States in a convenient, cheap, and expeditious manner, they may be superseded by other agencies created by Congress. The power to regulate includes the power to enforce regulations. The law of a State cannot obstruct or oppose this power. Nor can its agents, under shelter of the authority of the State, impede, retard, or delay commerce among the States.

Civilization is often a question of communication. No nation can be really great unless its means of intercommunication are ample. Its comparative influence depends rather upon roads and ships than upon armies. The empires of the past have been great only while they maintained their superiority in modes of transit. The highways of imperial Rome supported her ascendancy as well as her legions. Internal commerce is the life-blood of a nation, as essential to national existence as an army or navy, more essential than separate departments of the Government or the careful division of political power. As an object of government internal commerce is only secondary to the preservation of life and property. This principle was recognized by the framers of the Constitution. They could not foresee the new modes of transit devised in recent times, but they declared the power of the nation, not only over external but internal commerce, when between States. When the canoe, the scow, the keel-boat, and the raft were the agents of commerce on navigable rivers they secured the power of Congress over them. When the sailing vessel owned by private merchants and engaged in free competition on the ocean and lakes were the agents of commerce, jurisdiction over them, the power to regulate them, was carefully reserved to Congress. The control over commerce, the duties levied upon commerce, the necessity for uniform commercial regulations, were leading inducements for the formation of the national Government, and these powers were clearly and fully given to the new Government. If the framers of the Constitution could have foreseen the forty thousand miles of railroads and the steamships, telegraph, express, and transportation companies that now are the agents of commerce, overlapping State lines and extending their operations to the remotest hamlets of the country, they could not have adopted language more clearly conferring upon Congress the power over all these agencies than the language of the Constitution.

Reasoning thus from the nature and character of our Government and the language of the Constitution, I cannot doubt the full power of Congress not only to regulate the commerce among the States conducted by existing railroads, but when it deems it expedient to build new railroads, either directly by the money of the people or by corporations created by it; and this view is strengthened by the history of the Constitution.

The debates in the Congress of the Confederation that preceded the Convention show that the necessity of the regulation of commerce by Congress, and the prohibition of State taxes and restraints on commerce, was a chief cause which led to the national convention, and one upon which there was least division of opinion.

Mr. Hamilton, in No. 11 of the Federalist, says:

"The importance of the Union, in a commercial light, is one of those points about which there is least room to entertain a difference of opinion, and which has, in fact, commanded the most general assent of men who have any acquaintance with the subject. This applies as well to our intercourse with foreign countries as with each other."

The debates in the Convention show that the national power over commerce was conceded to be of primary importance, and especially the smaller States of Connecticut and New Jersey demanded for their safety against unfriendly legislation by the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, that commerce should be regulated by the General Government. Mr. Dayton, of New Jersey, was very solicitous lest "Pennsylvania would tax New Jersey under the idea of inspection duties, of which Pennsylvania would judge."

It never entered the mind of Mr. Dayton that New Jersey would lay an embargo between New York and Pennsylvania, or, by a monopoly, levy the great body of her taxes on the travel between these great neighboring States. That the power over commerce was a leading power of wide range and subject to abuse was conceded. Efforts were made to limit it to foreign commerce, and to require a two-thirds vote for commercial regulations; but these efforts failed, and the power was left to Congress in the most comprehensive language.

It was not only conferred in general language, but to avoid the inference that the power might, by construction, be confined to foreign commerce, unusual tautology was adopted by declaring it to extend to commerce among the several States.

Second. Legislative precedents.

The power of the United States to build works of internal improvement within the States has been settled by a series of precedents stretching through our entire legislative history and sanctioned by every department of the Government. The public records show that the policy in some form or other has been coeval with the existence of the Government, and the rapid progress of the nation is evidence of the wisdom of the policy. Vetoes have sometimes limited the general power for a time, but these are exceptions to the general rule. Rivers and harbors have been improved; canals have been made; turnpikes and railroads have been constructed; private property has been appropriated for public use, and almost every form of commercial improvement has been authorized and constructed by the authority of the General Government.

A long list of these appropriations is contained in Professor Baché's report to Congress some years ago, and in Wheeler's History of Congress. From these it appears that appropriations for internal improvement have been made during every Administration, for a great variety of improvement, and varying in character as commercial agencies advanced from turnpikes to canals, steamboats, and railroads.

The Cumberland road was commenced in the time of Mr. Jefferson. In the administration of Mr. Monroe the system of internal improvements was revived. The instructive debates in the Senate in 1824 and 1830 exhausted the constitutional argument. I cannot add to the arguments then made, and I will not consume the time of the Senate in reading extracts here. Mr. Webster, in his second reply to Mr. Hayne, proved conclusively that Mr. Calhoun, the champion of the most limited authority of Congress, had repeatedly conceded and voted for the unlimited authority of Congress over public improvements, with or without the consent of the States. And, sir, when we reflect upon the march of events, upon the debates and acts of this Senate during the last eight years, it seems idle to pause over the exercise of a power to build a national railroad to the capital of the nation when its necessity is so clearly demanded for the public good, and when it is only resisted by the interest of private corporations demanding a monopoly in the name of State rights.

If Senators desire to follow the constitutional argument further, they will find in the memorial to Congress of the Chicago internal improvement convention of 1848, the authorship of which is attributed to John C. Spencer, of New York, an argument that, to my mind, is conclusive upon every objection made to the power of Congress by the several veto messages of Presidents Polk and Tyler. This argument is on the record of Congress, and deserves a place among the ablest State papers of this century. I can add nothing to it.

A claim is sometimes made that though the power of Congress to build railroads is settled by legislative precedents, yet that Congress cannot condemn land for that purpose without the assent of the State. This claim is certainly untenable. The general power includes all the necessary and proper means to carry it into execution. This cannot be done without appropriating land.

It is true that the States within which an improvement was to be made have usually not only consented to the improvement, but have petitioned for and aided in the construction. In some cases Congress has required the consent of the State as a condition precedent to the construction of public works; but this has been done not from a want of power, but to secure local coöperation and aid.

The Constitution, as adopted, gave the power without protecting the citizen in his right of private property. This was corrected by article five of the amendments, which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. It is a safeguard to the citizen, and not to the State. The general power remains, and in no case does its exercise depend upon the consent of the State or any act of the State, and no act of the State can limit or affect the power of Congress, which, within its constitutional authority, is supreme.

The authority of Congress to build roads, canals, and all forms of internal improvement has been sustained by the Supreme Court whenever questioned before that tribunal. Though the direct question whether Congress may, in disregard of a State law, build a railroad within a State has never been presented; yet the tenor of the decisions of that court has always upheld the power of Congress to adopt its own agencies in the execution of its delegated powers and to disregard any obstructions set up by a State. The United States Bank cases and the Wheeling bridge case sustain all that is attempted by this bill. Whether the bank was an agency proper and necessary for the execution of any of the express powers of Congress was a question of doubt, but no man will question but that a railroad between Washington and New York is an agent of commerce between States, essentially and vitally necessary for the postal, military, and commercial service of the United States; and to hold that no such agent shall exist except it be created by a State, controlled by a State, regulated by a State, made a monopoly by a State, and beyond the power of Congress, is to destroy the essential qualities of a supreme national Government. It is secession intensified, for if a State seceded it lost the benefit of the protection of the General Government; but a State that can grapple and control for her own interests merely all communication over her territory could enjoy all the benefits of Union and yet inflict upon her sister States all the injuries of separate governments. The case of New Jersey is a marked and, fortunately for the country, an isolated example of this policy. Her territory lies between the two great cities of the continent. It is generally level, presenting no difficulties for constructing railroads. She receives vast local benefits from her proximity to those cities. One of those cities controls the commerce of the continent, the other is the chief manufacturing city of the continent. The road between them should be open, free, easy, and cheap. Every mode of transit should compete for the exchange of commodities and productions. Yet New Jersey undertakes to declare that but one corporation shall transport all these commodities and productions, and that this corporation shall collect for her a tax on all this commerce. This monopoly has been maintained for years, but expires within the present year. Efforts will be made for its renewal. At all events it will have power enough to prevent State authority for the construction of rival lines. Now, therefore, is the proper time to assert the authority of Congress to regulate commerce among the States by authorizing new lines of transit; by encouraging competition, improvement, and enterprise; by making the construction of railroads as free as the construction of merchant vessels and blacksmith shops, and by guarding by general laws the lives and safety of passengers on railroads as well as steamboats. We have already by a general telegraph law greatly increased the competition in that agency of commerce. We have often exercised our power to regulate commercial vessels, both on the sea and on the rivers. The iron track is now the great commercial road of mankind. Over it the commerce of men is now greater than by all kinds of navigable water. The locomotive is either superseding or revolutionizing the canal-boat, the sailing vessel, and the steamboat. It is creeping up every valley and overleaping every mountain of our vast country. It is everywhere the agent of commerce and civilization. It has added more to the wealth of our country than all the land and houses and possessions were worth forty years ago. If the railroad and telegraph are not national, then nothing is national. If railroads can only be built by a State, regulated by a State, monopolized by a State; if a State can prevent their construction to promote some local interest or monopoly, then our Government is not national.

The fear of Mr. Dayton, of New Jersey, has come true. A State, under pretense of State law, taxes other States.

It is one of the great beauties of our Constitution, framed by men of rare wisdom, that though man may invent and magnify; though the habits and agencies of their day are swept away by the inventive genius of their children; though our population has increased twelve-fold, and our country extends across the Continent, yet that the general principles and powers they have ingrafted in the Constitution, like the teachings of the Bible, meet all changes, all time, all diversities of condition, wealth, and population, and, applied with a liberal and fair construction, regulate agencies and things of which they had no conception, in harmony with their central idea of a local government for local purposes merely, affecting only the people of the State; a national government for general purposes, affecting the people of different States. I believe, sir, that in authorizing the construction of these railroads we exercise no doubtful power, while if our legislation is followed, as I hope it will be, by their speedy construction, we will have contributed not only to the local interests of this District, but to the common good and general welfare of the whole people of the United States.

Mr. President, in accordance with the notice I gave to the Senate, I now move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 728) relating to the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 738) to relieve from disabilities John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 728) relating to the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, on which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] has the floor.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate more than a few minutes. In regard to the facts in the case now under consideration I am not familiar with them; but there is a principle involved in this bill that in my estimation is very important, and it is therefore important that we should now come to a correct decision in regard to it. Before proceeding to notice the question really at issue it would be well enough to divest it of some extraneous matter that Senators seem disposed to throw around it.

Mr. President, this is not a bill to assess the United States for damages done by the armies of the United States, or by any other authority. It is not a question of damages. It is not whether we shall pay for property destroyed incidentally in the prosecution of the war, or accidentally in the prosecution of the war, but it is a bill for compensation for the property of a loyal citizen of the United States, taken under and by virtue of competent authority upon the part of the United States, and appropriated and used for the benefit of the United States. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] stated yesterday that he thought there would be greater equity in extending the liberality and the pity of Congress to the loyal men who had been persecuted and harassed by the rebels in the South only because they were loyal, for injuries which they had received in consequence of their loyalty, and for no other cause, than to grant the relief asked for in this bill. But, sir, this is a misconception of the principle of the bill, similar to that of Senators who suppose that this claim is one for damages done.

This bill does not predicate the claim to the consideration of Congress upon any wrong done to a loyal citizen within the enemy's territory; it is not for any damages done to any loyal citizen within the enemy's territory; it is not to compensate for any wrong received by a citizen in the enemy's territory either at the hands of the rebels or at the hands of the United States; but it is to make compensation for the benefit which the United States have received. Any matter of wrong to the claimant is wholly a matter outside of this bill. It is for the benefit that the United States have received, not for the wrong that a citizen living in the enemy's territory received. It is, sir, whether, having received the property of a loyal citizen residing within the territory of the enemy, (as is alleged, though incorrectly so,) and used to the benefit of the United States, there is not a moral, a legal, a religious obligation upon the United States to pay a fair compensation for it. Sir, I contend that there is; that by every principle of justice; that by every principle of equity; that by every principle of honor; that by every principle of common honesty, we cannot escape the obligation to pay for property that we have taken belonging to a loyal citizen, no matter where he resides, and have received the benefit of in its use in the support of our armies or in support of the cause of the Union in the prosecution of the war.

The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said that this would raise the question whether we were not bound to pay for every article of property seized by General Sherman as he passed across the fields of the South. Well, sir, so far as I am concerned, I say we are, if it was seized by lawful competent military authority and was the property of a loyal citizen, and was duly and lawfully appropriated to the benefit of our armies in the prosecution of the war.

Why, sir, suppose in the pursuit of those robbers and raiders along the shores of the North, who invaded, I believe, the State of Vermont and seized upon some of its property in its banks, I believe, the United States had sent its Army officers or any other competent authority to seize those men raiding upon the property of citizens of Vermont, and it had become necessary in the prosecution of that proper object to take a horse of the honorable Senator himself, as they passed across his fields, and appropriate it to the use of the party in pursuit of the offenders, and it was so appropriated, and the public authorities of the United States did so receive the use and benefit of that property, would not every obligation rest upon us to pay the honorable Senator from Vermont for his horse or any other property appropriated under those circumstances? We have done it under similar circumstances, as I shall show hereafter. We are estopped from preferring any such objection by appropriations for payment for property seized in Ohio and property seized in Indiana during the Morgan raid, which we have already paid for out of the Treasury of the United States, or we are still bound to pay for it by our own legislation.

Now, sir, let us look a little more into this matter. Senators seem to think that those general principles referred to the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] as lying at the foundation of our Government, do not have any application here. Sir, I regard the principle as fundamental and as sacred that the obligation upon the part of the United States to protect and defend its citizens can never be abandoned with honor to the United States so long as the citizen is faithful to his obligations to the Government. The obligation between the Government and the citizen is mutual, and it cannot be pre-terminated; it cannot be dispensed with by one party so long as the other party is faithful to its obligation. While the citizen is faithful, while he holds to his fealty, while he discharges the obligation of citizenship, the theory of our Government is and the principles of justice and right are that the Government shall bring to bear all its powers to the end that that citizen receives no detriment that shall not be redressed. The obligation is as eternal as the Government, and it is as sacred as the eternal principles of justice, that while the citizen is faithful to his obligations to the Government, the Government is bound to see that he is protected, and that he receives no detriment from any source, much less from the fostering and paternal hand of the Government itself. And so, sir, we have incorporated in the great fundamental law of this country that sacred principle that the Government, or its agents, or its authorities, shall in no case take private property for public use without due compensation.

Well now, sir, what is there in this case or in the circumstances surrounding it to take it out of the operation of these general principles and from under the operation of this general rule? Why, sir, it is said that this party lived within the enemy's territory. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, has said enough to disabuse the minds of the Senate of that pretense, because from the time this property was appropriated to this day that section where the property was appropriated has never been within the enemy's lines at all, as I understand. But suppose it was so, what difference would it make?

Mr. MORTON. I ask for information in what way this property was appropriated? Was it by a formal order?

Mr. WILLEY. By the order of General Sherman, as I understand, the commander in authority, seized and appropriated for a lawful military purpose. It was not destroyed in battle, but it was seized to make a fortification to secure our men from the bullets of the enemy, to protect our soldiers and citizens—as lawful a purpose as any that can be designated. It was, as I understand, taken and appropriated for a lawful military purpose. That is all I need say about the facts. It was taken and appropriated for a purpose which in the opinion of the commanding general was a necessary purpose. In the prosecution of the war, in the discharge of his duties as the commander of the troops at that place, by his order, by his authority it was so taken, so used; and by that authority this loyal citizen has been deprived of her property, which has gone to the benefit of the United States; and now the question is whether we will pay this loyal citizen for her property, seized and appropriated in the manner which I have suggested.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will permit me I wish to ask him a question, because I have not studied this matter, and do not know how I shall vote upon the bill. I will ask him to state the difference in principle as to the liability of the Government between a case where property was seized, like this, for the purpose of making a fortification, and where the property of a Union man was destroyed by General Sherman on his march without any formal order; whether there is any difference in principle between the two cases. If there is not, then the payment of this claim would make the Government liable for the property of all Union people destroyed by the march of our armies or in the progress of a battle. If there is a distinction, I should be glad to have the Senator state it.

Mr. WILLEY. I am certain that I shall not be able to state the distinction any more clearly than it must be apparent to the mind of the honorable Senator himself. I have already stated that this bill was not for property destroyed accidentally, incidentally, or by the unauthorized action and trespass of any portion of our armies. It must be apparent to the Senator that there is a wide distinction between such a claim as that and a claim for property seized and taken by competent military authority and appropriated legitimately to the benefit of the United States. Where a soldier or an officer commits a trespass or acts without authority, he is simply a trespasser, and liable to the laws for his trespass; and where an injury occurs incidentally, not by the direct act of the United States authorities themselves, that may be the misfortune of the party upon whom the injury falls; but here is a legitimate order given by legitimate authority to seize property and to apply it to a legitimate purpose for the benefit of the United States, and it creates, as I think, an implied obligation to pay for it, and if the authority that did it, if the United States, were an individual instead of the Government, it would imply such a legal obligation as would sustain a suit and authorize a recovery in assumpsit for the value of the property so taken and used. I hold that every honorable obligation rests upon the Government of the United States to be as faithful to its duties and its obligations as any individual would be under our laws.

Now, Mr. President, suppose that this case had occurred within our own lines; suppose it had occurred in the State of Ohio. I need not argue upon that hypothesis, because the Senate has already appropriated money for a case like this that occurred in the State of Ohio. But suppose this very case had occurred in the State of Ohio, within the loyal lines. The Government takes the property of a loyal citizen, has need of it, applies it to a legitimate purpose, and receives the benefit of it; would there be no obligation resting upon the Government to pay for that property? Would not the obligation be complete? How could we escape it? Sir, there would be no pretense that we could escape it. There would be no effort to escape it. We would recognize the obligation at once and make an appropriation to pay for it when the evidence was complete that the property had been so taken, seized, and used.

How is the case different when it occurs within the lines of the enemy? Authorities have been introduced here by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] I propose to examine those authorities; and I shall suggest that those very authorities establish a principle different from that which they were quoted to prove by the honorable Senator from New Jersey. I am willing to recognize the application of the principle of law that we can make no distinction between the loyal citizen and the disloyal citizen within the enemy's lines during the existence of the war; but whenever the war ceases that distinction ceases, and the original obligation between the citizen and the Government resumes its full function and force; and thereafter, when peace is declared and the flag of the Government is again established over the rebellious territory, the rights and privileges and immunities of the loyal citizens resume their functions also, and they thereafter have a standing in court for any legiti-mate rights which accrued during the existence of the war as between the Government and such citizens.

The first authority quoted by the honorable Senator was that from Vattel, with which I was familiar; but I suggest to the honorable Senator that the law does not bear him out in the position which he has assumed. The authority quoted by him is as follows:

"Civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties who can consider each other as enemies and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time"—

Mark that language, Mr. President, "at least for a time"—

"two separate bodies, two distinct societies," &c.

The honorable Senator then proceeded to quote from the prize cases, and came down to Mrs. Alexander's cotton case. I propose to invite his attention and consideration to the extract which he read from the latter case, and also to invite his attention to a further extract from the same opinion of the Chief Justice in that case. The clause of the opinion of the Chief Justice which the honorable Senator from New Jersey relied upon is as follows:

"It is said that though remaining in rebel territory Mrs. Alexander had no personal sympathy with the rebel cause, and that her property therefore cannot be regarded as rebel property; but this court cannot inquire into the personal character and disposition of individual inhabitants of enemy territory; we must be governed by the principles of public law, so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the Legislature and the Executive"—

Mark that language—

"or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed."

Now, sir, is not the relation between this Government and Alabama, the State where this citizen lives, thoroughly changed? Is not peace restored? Is not the authority of the United States Government, which never was vacated there in point of fact, but was driven away temporarily, reestablished over the territory of Alabama again? Are not her Senators upon this floor? Are not her Representatives in the other Hall? Are not all the functions of the United States Government restored in that State? Why shall not this loyal citizen now, when the relations are thoroughly changed, when the courts of the United States are reestablished there, and the authority of the Government is reestablished there, be recognized in her rights?

Why, sir, let me read a further extract from that opinion; and I invite the attention of the honorable Senator to it. If he had read a little further in that opinion he would have found the following. The court seem to imply that it was only during the war that loyal persons could have no standing in court, for they say, "Being now," that is, at the time when the suit was prosecuted and the case was pending, and the war was still raging:

"Being now a resident in enemy territory, and in law an enemy, she can have no standing in any court of the United States so long as that relation shall exist."

Implying that when that relation ceased she could have a standing in court and would be entitled to recover any just rights that might have accrued to her during the existence of the war. Sir, the cases cited by the honorable Senator from New Jersey do not, therefore, as I think, carry him out to his conclusion. There is a just reservation here. There ought to be a reservation here.

Why, Mr. President, just look at the case. Here is a loyal citizen, standing firm by his loyalty during all these terrible years of strife, persecuted, driven from his home, cast into dungeons, and sometimes threatened with the gallows; still he stands firm by his integrity; his property is seized, his houses are burned by the hands of the rebel over his head, and his family are scattered abroad upon the land, thrust out upon the cold charities of a community who scowl upon him, and scowl upon his family, because his heart has never faltered in his fealty to his Government. The war ceases, and this firm friend of the country comes out of the smoke of the last battle with glad eyes and bounding heart to salute his old flag, and he is met by the Senate of the United States with the response, "Sir, you are no better than a rebel; any property that we seized and took of yours might as well have been seized and burnt by the rebels; we will not pay you a cent." That is the statement of the case. You may talk about international law, and lawyers may cover over this claim and the principle of this bill by the technicalities of the law; but the sentiment of every right heart revolts at all such injustice, and says that when a great and magnanimous nation like the United States receives from one of its loyal citizens his property and applies it to the benefit of the United States, that citizen must and shall be paid every cent of the value of the property so used.

Why, sir, look at the impolicy of any other course. Suppose we reject this bill; suppose we say to the people of the United States and the world that we will make no distinction between loyal men and disloyal men in insurrectionary districts; what will be the result in time to come? What will be the result when we have another war? Shall we have any loyal person there to make a diversion in our favor? What do we say to loyal men in rebellious districts? We say to them, "You had better succumb at once; your fealty to us is worth nothing; your fidelity to us is only worthy of scorn and contempt when you bring it to bear upon any claim that you have upon the consideration of Congress in the Senate of the United States; you had better go to the rebels and say to them, 'We are with you,' and thereby keep persecution off your head and off your family; you can expect no favor from us; we regard you simply as we regard rebels, not only during the war and under the exigencies of the strife and the battle, but when we have reestablished our authority you are then to be no better than a rebel, and all your loyalty and fidelity to the flag will be of no account and of no avail in your behalf." Sir, there is not a right-minded man on the face of the earth who will not revolt at such a theory on the mere statement of the case; and this is a true statement of the question.

We are told that we cannot pay these claims because the amount will be so large that we shall not be able to meet the demand upon the Treasury of the United States. Sir, there is a mistake here. But suppose the amount is very large, cannot a great and magnanimous nation afford to pay it? In my opinion we can better afford to meet hundreds of millions of dollars in the discharge of our just and equitable obligations than we can afford, as a great nation, in the eyes of the world and of history, to repudiate one dollar of just obligation which is demanded at our doors. Why, sir, this is repudiation, and nothing else. Can it be possible that the Government of the United States will take from its loyal citizens their means, their money, their property, and apply it, appropriate it, use it, receive the benefit of it, and yet repudiate the obligation to make just compensation for it? Sir, is it honorable? Is it honest?

The honorable Senator from New Jersey said yesterday that pestilence cometh sometimes, and it falls upon a city, and it makes no distinction between the loyal and the disloyal, the good and the bad. Let us apply his figure. What was the pestilence in this case? It would seem from the application given to it by the honorable Senator from New Jersey that it was General Sherman's army instead of the rebels. I hold that the rebels were the pestilence, that General Sherman was the physician, and that this lady's house which was appropriated was the apothecary shop, and that the physician seized the medicine—the means—belonging to this lady to drive away the pestilence, the rebels. That is the true application of his figure, if it has any application. I hope he will not be so ungenerous as to refuse to pay the apothecary for the medicine we used in driving away this terrible pestilence. Would that be just? Does that consist with the sense of equity and justice of the honorable Senator.

Again, the honorable Senator cited the principle of law recognized so long ago as we learn from the authority he cited, that when a city is in flames and the fire is marching with its devastating track in one direction, you may blow up a house in the line of its progress to arrest the conflagration. So you may; but take care how you do it. You must show beyond all peradventure that the march of the flames would not have stopped until it reached the house, and that if it had remained where it stood without being blown up or removed it would have burnt down; and you destroy it at your peril unless you are able to show that the danger was so imminent that the conflagration could not have been prevented in any other way. Therefore it is, sir, that the party owning the building or the mansion can receive no compensation. Why? Because his building would have been burnt up if it had not been blown up; and it must be shown that the danger was so imminent as to leave no reasonable doubt that it would have been burnt before authority can be presumed to blow it up. There was no such danger here. No such principle is applicable in this case. This is simply a case where the proper authority of the United States, where the Army of the United States, General Sherman at its head, sitting down in peace, with the enemy in his front to be sure, but the facts showing that they never came behind where he was at that time so as to reclaim the territory, and the territory was never again within the enemy's lines, seizes the property of a loyal citizen, takes it, and applies it to the use of the United States, and we get the benefit of it, and this lady now applies at the doors of Congress for compensation for her property; and Senators say that the laws of war, and Vattel, and the prize cases, and the Mrs. Alexander case will not justify us in paying her! The doctrine cited might be applicable if the property of the claimant had been destroyed to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy and being used to our hurt by the enemy; but no such exigency existed in the case under consideration.

I have shown what this Alexander case means, and what the law in Vattel means; that they contain a reservation in favor of just such a case as this. But if there was no such reservation there is that in every man's heart that says "pay it." Why, sir, to apply it to an individual, suppose any of us had taken this property on our own account and applied it to our own use, any Senator would be insulted if you asked him whether he felt that there was an obligation on his part to pay for it. How is the case changed in morals, or in law, if you please, when the Government of the United States, our great Government, steps in and takes the property of a citizen? It is bound by our theory of government to protect him all the time, and there is no course left but simply to pay for what we receive. There stands our constitutional obligation. We can take no "private property without just compensation." Away with your Vattel! Stand by the Constitution. It is posterior to Vattel. It supersedes Vattel, even if the Senator from New Jersey rightly interprets him. Our Constitution, not Vattel, is our rule of action. Its requirement is founded in justice. It makes no reservation of time or circumstances when this provision is to be or not to be applied. By its terms its force never ceases in war or peace.

Mr. President, I had no design to enter into the discussion so much at length as I have done, and now I desire simply to make one further remark in conclusion; and that is, that this is not a new principle of policy for which I am contending to be introduced into the legislation of Congress for the first time. If we are to pay any regard to what we have done in the past, not in relation to the Armes case, not in relation to the other cases that were cited here the other day, but in regard to general statutes having reference to this class of cases and to rights like those involved in this controversy; if we are to pay any regard to our own legislation in such cases, we are estopped from denying that there rests an obligation upon us to pay this lady a just compensation for her property.

How was it in 1862? I invite honorable Senators' attention to this, especially the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] We not only made a distinction in the confiscation of property between the loyal and disloyal, as you will see by the act of 1862, section six, adverted to the other day by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee, but he might have referred to another section, and I will read that section, or part of it—the tenth section:

"That no slave escaping into any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, from any other State, shall be delivered up, or in any way impeded or hindered of his liberty, except for crime, or some offense against the laws, unless the person claiming said fugitive shall first make oath that the person to whom the labor or service of such fugitive is alleged to be due is his lawful owner, and has not borne arms against the United States in the present rebellion, nor in any way given aid and comfort thereto."

Why, sir, we have here a statute binding us to redeliver slave property to a loyal owner living in the enemy's territory when he escapes; and this in 1862, when the war was raging and in full force and vigor; and to-day what do you say to a loyal lady who comes here claiming the poor pittance of compensation for all, I understand, she had on the face of the earth, which was used by the Government—not slave property, not property in human beings, but the means of livelihood and the place where this lady had her only home and means of refuge and covert from the storm—this was taken from her. She comes here and asks compensation for it, and, with a statute staring us in the face that we were willing in 1862 to deliver slaves escaping from a loyal master living in southern territory back again to bondage, we say to her, "Begone; you have no standing here in the Senate of the United States; we have got your property; we have used it; the United States have received the benefit of it; we do not pretend to deny that, but we do not intend to pay for it."

Now, Mr. President, I hope that will not be the case, and that the Senate will pause before they put upon the records of the nation the fact that the United States, under any circumstances, will avail itself of the use and benefit of the property of any of its loyal citizens and yet refuse a fair and just compensation for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I rise to make a single remark; for I confess that if the view taken by the Senator from West Virginia of the cases by me cited be correct I am in great error in reference to them. If he has got the spirit and meaning of either of the cases to which he alludes I have not.

The Senator calls attention to the reference in Vattel, which is in these words:

"These two parties therefore must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies."

And on the words "at least for a time" the Senator draws the conclusion that after civil war ceases what transpired during its continuance is to be judged of as if it had transpired in a time of peace. And the same construction is attempted to be given to the very clear and explicit declaration of the Supreme Court in Mrs. Alexander's cotton case. There the Chief Justice says—and I will assure the Senator that I had read the whole case:

"We must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the Legislature and the Executive, or otherwise that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed."

Now, the idea of the Senator seems to be that when the war ceases everybody has then a claim for what transpired during the war, as if no war had existed; that the war was only a postponement of the rights of claimants; while it is clear that the court intends and says that the section in rebellion is to be considered as enemy territory, subject to all the incidents of war while war exists, but no longer. The court does not intend that the principles of peace and of municipal law are to be applied to a period when the law is silent and when martial law prevails.

I do not rise to again argue this question. It is too plain. To insist that a victorious belligerent is bound in law to pay for the occupation of property in the enemy territory while war existed is attempting to establish as law that which is in direct opposition to established law, in opposition to the teachings of elementary books, to the doctrine laid down by our own courts. And to insist that after this nation, at the entreaty and prayer of the loyal people of the South, have by the expenditure of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives rescued the country, it is to be held liable to make compensation for the injury resulting from the war is to attempt to visit with a punitive return the greatest heroism.

I know that local interests sometimes influence our judgment; but the States recently in insurrection and now reconstructed are intimately interested in the welfare of the country, and the representatives from those States should, I think, be careful not to aid in the adoption of a principle injurious to a nation as dear to them as to any other section. To call upon the loyal North, after its expenditure of blood and treasure and while loaded with taxation, to inaugurate a system of payments founded neither in justice nor in law would, I submit, be making a poor return for the great work that has been accomplished.

Mr. RICE. Mr. President, this debate having taken the turn that it has, bringing up the whole question of the payment of claims of the loyal citizens of the South, I deem it my duty, as my constituents are to some extent affected, to give my views upon the subject. I will do so very briefly, because I have not examined the legal questions in the case with very great care from the fact that I was not aware that this bill would bring up that subject in the manner that it has done.

This bill, as I understand, is for the payment of a single individual for property appropriated by the Government of the United States. There seems to be some question as to the point whether this was an appropriation of property or was simply a destruction of property; but if it is to be regarded as an appropriation, if it is to be regarded in the same light that we should regard the taking of so many horses and appropriating them for the use of the Government, or the taking of so much corn and appropriating it to Government use; if it is to be regarded in that light, and is to be acted upon in that way, then it brings up a question that is very important, and a question that if settled against the payment of these claims cuts off the loyal men of the South from payment for all the forage and all the subsistence stores that they furnished to the Federal Army. If the particular vote on this bill carried with it nothing else but the defeat of the bill I do not know that I should have anything to say, for I am not acquainted with the facts except as stated by the chairman of the Committee of Claims; but if it is to have the effect of declaring the sense of the Senate that they will pay no claims for property used by the Army in the South, then I have something to say.

The only point, as I understand, that is made against the payment of loyal citizens in the South at all, is that they were by the laws of war constructive enemies during the war and are to be treated yet as enemies of the Government of the United States. I know that that is so laid down in the books as being the law of war; but I know that that had its origin in foreign wars, where the invaded country owed no allegiance to the invaders, and where the invaders owed no protection to the country that they invaded. It may have been extended—and I believe has been—to revolutions in monarch-ical countries; but I cannot see that you can apply that law to our form of government. The power in this Government flows from the people, and when all the people that are loyal to the Government join together to maintain that Government I am unable to see why one loyal man has not the same right to be paid for his property that another has. I cannot see why one loyal man who is a part and parcel of the Government, who goes to make up the power of the Government, has not as much right to payment for his property, if he has furnished any for the use of the Government, as any other loyal man has.

The Government owes some protection to its citizens. It has been stated here that that protection is incidental and not direct; that the main duty of the Government of the United States is with foreign countries, and that the citizen must look to the State for his direct protection. If that be true the converse of the proposition is true also, that the citizen owes no direct allegiance to the Federal Government, but that his allegiance is direct to his State. That is not the doctrine now established. The doctrine now established and believed in, I think, very generally, is that the citizen owes an allegiance direct to the Government of the United States, and that that allegiance is paramount to all other allegiance. If that be true the Government owes him a protection that is direct; and I believe in past times the Government has always recognized the duty of giving that protection whenever it has been required. The Constitution itself contemplated that protection, and authorized the Governors of States to call for Federal troops to suppress insurrection; and the sheriffs of counties under existing orders may now call on Federal troops at any time to protect persons and property within the county, and the commanding officer of any locality in any State, if he sees riot or disorder in the community, has a right of his own motion to suppress it.

Then, if it be true that the Government owes a protection direct to the citizen, the Government should furnish that protection to the extent, at least, of paying for what it receives at his hands. I do not hold that the Government is responsible for any damages that arose from the ravages of war. The Government did all it could to protect the loyal citizens of the country. That is all that could be required of the Government. But having done that, having done its duty in that respect, and no claim being presented for damages, on what principle do you deny to the citizen the right to payment for his property which the Army used and which they would have had to purchase somewhere else had they not got it from the man they did?

It has been said here that the cotton cases, in which Congress has already said that the loyal inhabitants of the South may recover pay for cotton, differ from other cases. Wherein? Wherein do they differ? If a man has furnished $10,000 worth of cotton, and the Government has appropriated it and put the avails in the Treasury, and pays those avails over to the loyal claimant, wherein does that differ from the Government having received $10,000 worth of corn or of horses from another individual? Why not pay for them? On what principle do you pay for the cotton and not for the other? It is said to be on the principle that the Government got the cotton, and by paying for it is nothing the loser, because it sold it for the same money that it paid out. On the same principle if it got the corn and used it, although it did not sell it, it got the benefit of it, the avails of it, and if it now pays for it is the Government anything the loser? It seems to me not.

It seems to me that the principle which has been acted on through the whole war has been to disregard this doctrine of constructive enemies. The Government has, in the cotton cases, ignored that law. The Departments have ignored it. The quartermasters issued vouchers during the entire war to citizens of the southern States, payable upon proof of loyalty. They made that the test instead of locality, as is claimed here to be the true test. The Departments and Congress have recognized that test, that the loyalty of the claimant was what was to guide them in making payment. Those vouchers were issued from time to time from the commencement of the war to its close. The Departments have recognized them, have issued orders as to how loyalty is to be proven, have sent out their blanks, and the quartermasters have taken the proof and have made payments, and Congress has appropriated the money for that purpose. There is no instance in which Congress has not made the distinction upon the ground of loyalty, and not locality, except in the act closing the Court of Claims to the people of the South; and that was only temporary, for the moment that the State of Tennessee was readmitted to representation that moment that law was repealed so far as Tennessee was concerned, showing that it was merely a temporary expedient, to be enforced only until the reconstruction of the State was complete. All we ask is that the same principle be extended to the other States as they from time to time complete their reconstruction.

On what ground of justice—it is said to be on that ground—do you say that the man in the State of Alabama who has furnished ten thousand bushels of corn to the Army of the United States is not as much entitled to compensation for it, if he was loyal to the Government, as the man in Pennsylvania who furnished the same amount? As a question of justice, are not both supporting the Government of the United States? Are not both doing all in their power to sustain that Government? Both are citizens and residents of the United States, belonging to the same common country. I can see no difference in point of justice; and I think, so far as the law is concerned, the theory of constructive enemies has been disregarded from the commencement of the war to the present time by every department of the Government, and I do not think it was ever applied at all except during the war. What is the reason and necessity of that doctrine any way? It is that an invading army going into the territory of the enemy cannot stop to discriminate between the loyal and disloyal; that they cannot stop to protect one man and destroy another; that they cannot inquire which property belongs to a loyal inhabitant and which does not; that they cannot suffer the Army to be without supplies even if they find them in the hands of a loyal man, nor can they leave supplies in his hands for the opposing army to get in case of their evacuation. They have to do these things as a military necessity. That is the true rule and the true principle. Instead of men being constructive enemies because they lived in that locality, from military necessity they have to be treated as such simply. When the war is over, when the necessity has ceased, they are remitted to all the rights that any other loyal citizens have. If they have furnished stores and subsistence to the Army they are entitled, like any one else, to payment for it. Does it cost the Government any more to pay a man in Arkansas, who was loyal, for his corn than it cost across the line in Missouri to pay a man there for his? The principle is the same, and we have acted upon it all the time, that loyalty is the test of a man's rights under this Government, and not his locality.

Now, as to the amount of these claims, some have told me that they would reach $500,000,000. I have not any idea but that $25,000,000 would cover every dollar's worth of property taken by the Army in the South from loyal citizens and appropriated for the use of the Army. I think the amount is less, but I have no idea it would reach over $25,000,000. This estimate of $500,000,000 is made upon the basis upon which this question has been argued, that we are to pay for property destroyed in the natural course of the war; but that is not the principle I am advocating. I am simply contending that where the Army or the Government has received the benefit of the subsistence stores, of the horses, the cattle, the corn of a loyal man, wherever he may be, the Government ought to pay for the property which it has thus received from him and used. That is all I claim. We are asking no favors; we are not asking the generosity of the Government to give us as charity anything for our sufferings during the war; but we are simply asking that when they have received the benefit of what we had they should pay a fair valuation for it.

Sir, the loyal man of the South has had a very poor show in this war if he is not to be paid for what the Government of the United States has received from him. He has been subject to the ravages of both armies; they have both run over him, while the disloyal man has only been subjected to the ravages of the Federal Army, his own army, as far as possible, protecting him. So that there were two chances against a loyal man to one in his favor, or rather to none in his favor. He has had no chance either during the war or after the war.

Again: this doctrine of "constructive enemies" has been ignored in the receiving of soldiers in the disloyal States. Ten thousand soldiers enlisted in the Federal Army in the State of Arkansas. Were they, under the laws of war, because of their locality all enemies of the Government? Were they enemies then? Are they enemies still? The Government received them and treated them as friends, notwithstanding their locality. It made loyalty there the test; it received them; it paid them; it is paying them pensions now; it has paid them their bounties. It has recognized in every way it could the loyal men in the South as the friends of this Government and not as its enemies.

Now, on what principle will you say that a man who lives in the State of Arkansas and is in the Federal Army is a friend, and that his property is at the same time enemy property? Would you confiscate his property on this rule or theory of his being a constructive enemy? Would you try and hang him for treason, notwithstanding he served in the Federal Army, on the same principle? No, sir; you would do just as the Government has been doing—wherever you found a loyal man you would protect him. The Government has not waited until the war was over to do this, but it has been careful to do it during the war wherever it possibly could. In traversing the country where the armies moved slowly they always distinguished between the rebels and the Union men; they always protected their friends. They did not wait until the war was over to give time for this protection. Now that the war is over, now that peace is restored and we can look around and see who were the friends of the Government, I do not see why one friend of the Government should be treated better than another. I do not see that one friend of the Government, because he lived in one State, has anything more due him from the Government than a friend of it who lived in another portion of the country.

Taking this view of the question I shall insist at all times upon the payment of the loyal men of the South for property used by the Government of the United States; and I intend before this session is over to present a bill to bring up that simple question that will not be subject to any doubts in regard to the meaning of it, but which shall provide distinctly for payment for supplies, subsistence stores, and things that the Army used and that they would have had to purchase elsewhere if they had not got them there. But this debate having taken the range it has, at any rate that question having been argued, I wished to give my views upon it, that I might not be misunderstood.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, being a member of the Committee on Claims, and having concurred with the majority of that committee in the report favoring this claim and proposing that it should be satisfied by the appropriation of money, I deem it proper to state the views which controlled my action.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will give way I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor for that motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I am indifferent as to whether the Senate adjourn at this time or not. I frankly admit that I have made no mature preparation to argue the great principles involved in this case. I think myself that in point of principle there never was a more important bill before the Congress of the United States. That is the estimate in which I hold the principles involved in this bill. The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. RICE] has approximated very closely, if he has not struck plumb, in my judgment, the principles upon which this bill should be considered and decided.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will yield the floor I will make the motion that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor for that motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield for that purpose. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SOLOMON OLIVER.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1588) for the relief of Solomon Oliver; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ENLISTED MEN IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House how many enlisted men of the Army now on duty in Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia were citizens or residents of the late rebel States during the rebellion, and how many were soldiers in the late rebel army.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS OF VERMONT.

Mr. POLAND presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution relating to reciprocity of trade with the Dominion of Canada.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That, having an intelligent regard for the best interests of Vermont, it is the duty of our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence against the consummation of any treaty relating to reciprocity in trade with the Dominion of Canada, and to insist that the subject of our trade and commercial intercourse with Canada, as well as with all other foreign countries, is not a proper matter of treaty stipulation, but belongs to Congress, and should be wisely regulated by a judicious tariff.

Resolved, That the secretary of State be, and is hereby, directed to transmit a copy of this joint resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives.

Mr. POLAND also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution concerning grants of the public lands of the United States.

Whereas the Government of the United States has from time to time granted large tracts of valuable lands to various, and almost all of the western and southern States, for the purposes of aiding the education or internal improvements in those States; and whereas the State of Vermont, although at all times fully and completely doing her duty to the United States, has, in only one instance, been the recipient of such bounty and favor from the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use their best endeavors to procure from the Government of the United States such grants of unappropriated public lands; for the aid and advancement of education, and for the promotion of internal improvements in the State of Vermont, as will be just and equitable.

Mr. POLAND also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution relating to navigation between the United States and Canada.

Whereas the rapidly increasing commerce between the eastern States and the Northwest is calling for more ample and cheaper transportation; and whereas, also, certain mutual privileges are now enjoyed by both Canada and the United States, touching navigation and transportation, which ought, on the part of the two countries, to be matured into rights: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That if, by treaty or otherwise, the free navigation of Canadian waters and the use of the Canadian canals by the shipping of the United States upon the same terms as by Canadian and British shipping, and the free transit by land of American merchandise across Canadian territory can be secured in exchange for like privileges to Canadian shipping in our waters and British and Canadian merchandise over our soil, our Senators and Representatives in Congress are urged to use their influence to bring about such an arrangement; and in such negotiation to secure, if possible, the construction of a ship-canal connecting the St. Lawrence with Lake Champlain; and that our Government, in case the State of New York will consent thereto, offer, in exchange therefor, to enlarge the Champlain canal to the same proportions as that which shall connect the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain, and allow the use thereof upon the same terms as are imposed upon American shipping.

Resolved, That the Governor of this State be, and is hereby, requested to transmit copies of this joint resolution to the Governors of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa; also copies thereof to the Governor General of Canada and the President of the United States.

GEORGE NICHOLS,
Secretary of State.

DISABILITIES OF JOHN G. STOKES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 738; to relieve from disabilities John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama. Mr. Stokes, I believe from the evidence is a true Union man, and has been elected to office, and if he is to be relieved at all, it should be done at once that he may enter upon the duties of his office.

Mr. MILLER. If he is a true Union man what is the necessity for removing any disabilities.

Mr. BOUTWELL. He was a solicitor, being a lawyer previous to the war, and took some part in the war, but he is trusted by the Republicans of Alabama, and is an editor of the leading journal of that State. I believe he is as well entitled to have his disabilities removed as any man on whom the judgment of Congress has been favorably passed.

Mr. NIBLACK. If I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, he stated that this gentleman now votes the Republican ticket in Alabama.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I presume he does, as he is the editor of one of the leading Republican papers.

Mr. NIBLACK. Well, that ought to be satisfactory, [laughter,] and I hope there will be no objection, at least on this side of the House.

The bill was read. It proposes to remove all political disabilities imposed on John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama, by reason of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and received its several readings.

Mr. McKEE. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if this gentleman holds office now?

Mr. BOUTWELL. He is elected to office.

Mr. MULLINS. What office has he been elected to that he wishes these disabilities removed that he may fill it?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not know what the office is, but he has been elected to an office in the State of Alabama.

Mr. MULLINS. It is office they all want, and then they are very loyal, and as soon as they get it they will take you and me by the neck and plunge us over where they tried to get us before.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Stokes has been elected solicitor of Montgomery county, the duties of which office he will assume on Monday next, and it is important this bill should pass to-day in order to enable him to enter upon the duties of the office. He is indorsed by the entire delegation from my State, and I hope the bill will pass without further discussion.

The question was then taken upon the passage of the bill; and (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the bill was passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1589) to provide for cases of vacancies in the office of collector of the customs, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF EXPORTS, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration and adoption at this time:

Whereas on the 15th day of September, 1868, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, made an order discontinuing the offices of superintendents of exports and drawbacks at the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, after September 30, 1868; and whereas it is alleged that by subsequent order he has extended the terms of said offices and on the 4th day of March, 1869: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to this House the reasons which have led him to postpone the time for discontinuing such offices, the amount and character of the work done by the superintendents severally since the 30th day of September, 1893, the amount and character of work to be done during the time the offices are yet to continue, and the expense incurred or to be incurred for salaries, clerk hire, office rent, and other purposes, for keeping up said offices respectively in each of said cities after the 30th day of September last.

Mr. BROOKS. This resolution seems to convey the insinuation that these offices have been not wisely continued until the 4th of March next. I rise merely to remark that it will be found that the reasons for so doing are perfectly satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] object to this resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not.

Mr. SCHENCK. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] I will give my reasons for submitting this resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will have to object to the resolution if it shall give rise to debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; let it pass.

The preamble and resolution were then agreed to.

MAUMEE SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a copy of the report of General T. J. Crane, of the engineer department, upon the examination and survey of a ship-canal on the prolongation of the lower reach of the Maumee river through the shoal waters of Maumee bay, Ohio, directly to deep water in Lake Erie, with plans and estimates of the cost of constructing the same.

DEBTS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury, proposing a section to the general appropriation bill relative to expenses in collecting debts against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CENTRAL INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with an estimate for the pay of one clerk for the superintendent of the central superintendency; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECONSTRUCTION TESTIMONY, ETC.

Mr. BECK. I am instructed by the Committee on Reconstruction to submit the following resolution, and ask its adoption at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be authorized to cause the report of General Gillem, and appendices B and C attached thereto, relative to elections held in Mississippi, and also such testimony and statements in writing as they may take or receive relative to affairs in Mississippi, Georgia, Virginia, and Texas, under the references made to them, to be printed for the use of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. ADAMS for one month.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. ROOTS was appointed to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Education and Labor, caused by the resignation of Mr. BAKER.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill at this time for reference only.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order. Let the morning hour commence.

The SPEAKER. The first business during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Naval Affairs, where the call rested at the conclusion of the morning hour of yesterday.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. STEVENS. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1497) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, of which the committee recommend the passage.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this act the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint from the medical officers on the active list of the Navy a chief of Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, who shall be ex officio the ranking officer of the medical staff.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall, in like manner, appoint from the surgeons on the active list of the Navy, in the order of their official seniority, twelve medical inspectors, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a commodore in the line of the Navy; eighteen medical directors, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a captain; twenty deputy medical directors, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a commander; and thirty surgeons, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant commander; and one hundred and twenty assistant surgeons, including the assistant surgeons now in the Navy, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a master: Provided, That assistant surgeons of three years' service, who have been found qualified for promotion by a competent board of examiners, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenants: And provided further, That no medical officer shall, in virtue of his rank, exercise command or authority in the line of the Navy or in any staff corps belonging thereto, except in the medical staff and over those placed under the control of the medical department of the naval service: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall require the recall of any medical officers under sailing orders or at sea.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That medical inspectors and medical directors shall be employed at naval hospitals and laboratories, and as presidents and members of retiring and examining boards and courts, and other duty on shore; and that deputy medical directors shall be employed on board of flagships in fleets and squadrons, and at navy-yards and other naval stations; and that surgeons and assistant surgeons shall be employed on board of vessels commissioned for sea service, in receiving ships, at rendezvous and barracks, and on such other duties as the Secretary of the Navy may direct; and it shall be the duty of medical directors to supervise all matters pertaining to the medical department of the fleet, squadron, navy-yard, or station to which they may be assigned for duty; to receive, take charge of, and distribute on requisition, medicines, stores, and appliances furnished for the use of the sick and hurt of the Navy, and to purchase them, under the provisions of existing law, when not otherwise procurable; to approve all medical requisitions, and to designate medical officers of the fleet, squadron, or navy-yard, for special or general duty, subject to the approval of the officer in command of the same; and every medical director shall, from time to time, inspect the medical department of each vessel of the fleet, squadron, or station, as well as of the temporary camps, or hospitals, and receiving ships which may be attached to the command, and ascertain, as far as practicable, the general condition of the health of the officers and men, and recommend to the commander-in-chief such measures for execution as may be necessary, in his judgment, to preserve the health of the ships' companies and naval stations; and on being relieved from duty, afloat or ashore, he shall report to the chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery what has been, during his term of service, the sanitary condition of the command, and such matters of general or special professional interest as may have come under his observation.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That promotion from grade to grade in the medical staff of the Navy shall be in the order of official seniority, after physical and mental examination; and officers of the medical staff on the retired and reserved list may be promoted, if not physically and mentally disqualified, and they shall receive the same pay and emoluments as retired and reserved officers of the line with whom they are equal in rank, and may be employed on such shore duty as the Navy Department may determine.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to detain the House by any intended remarks upon this bill, but simply to say that the question which it presents has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs for the past year, and that the measure which I now report as a substitute has the unanimous approbation of the committee, who have directed me to ask its passage. Unless some gentleman desires to suggest some question in regard to the matter, I will call the previous question, and ask the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] whether this bill has been printed. It is a long bill and a very important one, introducing very radical changes in the existing system.

Mr. STEVENS. This question has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs for the last year, and parties interested have been heard. I think the bill in the precise form now reported by the committee has not been printed by the order of the House, but copies of the bill have been circulated and have been accessible to members.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In view of the importance of the bill and the discussion which must certainly be had upon it before it passes, and in view of the fact that the bill has not been printed, I suggest to the gentleman from New Hampshire that he should consent to the reference of this matter to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be fully discussed. I trust the gentleman does not expect to get through a bill of this kind in the morning hour. If it is to come up I certainly desire to be heard upon it, because there are some facts in relation to this subject which I wish to submit to the House. But I have not those facts now prepared in the shape in which I would like to present them to the House. I appeal, therefore, to my friend from New Hampshire to permit the matter to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and allow time for the printing of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that I understand the proposition he makes to be one which would probably kill the bill for want of time for its discussion. It is due to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as well as to the principle of the bill, to say that the measure has had a full and fair consideration before that committee, extending over a period of more than a year. I am prepared to discuss the bill at this time; and I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say yesterday that he was prepared to meet the questions presented and to oppose the bill.

I desire to say that the purpose of the bill is to bring the medical staff of the Navy into conformity with that of the line. It is undoubtedly well known to the House that since 1861 the line officers have been lifted up some four or five grades, from that of captain to that of full admiral, and have consequently enjoyed the promotion which attaches to those several ranks; while the medical staff, embracing men as advanced in age and length of service as any line officer, if not older, have been left precisely where they were before the war commenced, and are now, at home and at sea, subordinate in some respects in a most offensive manner to the command of the line, a command sometimes exercised by beardless boys over men who have served their country well and faithfully for more than twenty years.

After a careful examination of the objections to the present system, the Committee on Naval Affairs have unanimously come to the conclusion that justice, equity, and a due regard to the interests of the service demand that this promotion should be offered to the medical staff of the Navy in order that, with reference to the period of their service, their age, their skill and experience, they may stand upon an equality with the line.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, at this time to sustain the principle and the features of this bill by the highest authority which I can bring before this House, and that is a letter from the grand old hero Admiral Farragut, which has been placed in my hands this morning, and which exhibits in that brave and distinguished officer of the line a sense of justice as broad and ample as his hard-earned fame and glory. I will ask the Clerk to read first an original letter from Admiral Farragut, and then a certified copy of a letter, both recommending the principle of this bill to the favorable consideration of Congress, and recognizing plainly and fully the propriety of its details.

The Clerk read as follows:

113 EAST THIRTY-SIXTH STREET,
NEW YORK, January 2, 1899.

MY DEAR DOCTOR: I have read with great care the bill entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy," and as far as I have been able to discover it appears to be drawn up in a spirit of fairness and justice to all, and affords to the higher officers of the medical corps employment on shore after having obtained a certain grade. I do not hesitate to say that I approve of the principal features of the bill, but would insert in the third section, which refers to the employment of the different grades, "except in time of war," when all officers should be available for sea or other service, at the discretion of the Department.

I am, very truly, yours,

D. G. FARRAGUT, Admiral.

Surgeon JAMES C. PALMER, United States Navy.

NEW YORK, December 31, 1868.

MY DEAR DOCTOR: I have carefully read over the bill "for the reorganization of the medical corps of the Navy, making higher grades," &c., and I find no objections, except that in time of war all persons should be available for duty, only retaining their relative rank in their own corps. Without this clause the services of some of the most efficient medical officers might be lost to the Government when most essential. I am aware that such might not be the case, as they would no doubt volunteer; but while legislating it is best to provide for it on the face of the bill, although I am happy to say that, from my own experience, war is the time when I have always found the medical officers ready and willing to do their duty without regard to personal risk, and it gives me special pleasure to refer to your case in Mobile bay, where you, in the little Loyal, carried my orders around the fleet for the ships to run the ram Tennessee down, which you did with cheerfulness and alacrity.

I sent the other note to accompany the bill, and this only to explain the objection to leaving the war clause out.

Very truly, yours,

D. G. FARRAGUT, Admiral.

Surgeon JAMES C. PALMER, United States Navy.

The above is a correct copy.

J. B. TAYLOR,
Surgeon United States Navy.

Mr. STEVENS. I will now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. I would thank my friend of the Naval Committee to inform the House how many officers of the rank of commodore there are in the Navy at the present time?

Mr. STEVENS. The number is ninety.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I am not absolutely certain that when I come to consider this bill in all its details and relations I shall oppose it, although I am strongly impressed with the propriety of adopting the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that we may have an opportunity to consider it. I have never had an opportunity to examine its provisions, and they seem to be too important to incorporate into our legislation without having the bill printed.

It seems, sir, that there are already in the Navy—and I knew that fact before—almost one hundred officers of the rank of commodore; that is, of a rank corresponding to that of brigadier general in the Army. There are to-day almost ten times as many brigadier generals in the Navy as in the Army, and yet this bill proposes to add twelve to the number in the Navy and twenty or thirty to the number of the rank of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major; that is, to the number of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the Navy who have the assimilated rank of those respective officers. This bill gives the rank of brigadier general to twelve medical officers of the Navy, whereas there are, I believe, in the whole line and staff of the Army only thirteen. In the whole medical department of the Army there is, I believe, only one brigadier general.

Now, it does seem to me that justice to the medical department of the Navy cannot require that we should so largely increase the number of officers of that high rank in the Navy without careful examination of the whole subject. For one, thoroughly as I appreciate the services of the Navy during the war, high as is my estimate of the character of the officers of the Navy from my personal acquaintance with them, I cannot consent this morning, without seeing the bill in print, to add twelve to the number of commodores in the Navy. And I hope we shall not unwisely pass this bill in haste without an opportunity to see its effect.

If justice requires this to be done for the surgeons of the Navy, what, then, shall we say to the paymasters and engineers of the Navy; to the surgeons of the Army, and the paymasters, quartermasters, engineers, and commissaries of the Army? How can we refuse to advance the medical officers of the Army in rank when we shall have done it for the medical officers of the Navy? If in a comparatively small institution like that of the medical staff of the Navy we shall have increased the number of officers of that high rank until it shall almost equal the entire number of brigadier generals in the line and all the staff corps of the Army, justice to the Army, not merely the medical officers, but also the other staff officers and the line officers, demands that we should increase the number of officers holding that rank in the Army. If we do justice to one we must do it to both. We cannot bestow a compliment upon the medical department of the Navy alone without doing injustice either to other branches of the Navy or to every corps of the Army.

I hope, therefore, sir, that the gentleman who reported this bill will consent to have its consideration postponed so that we may have an opportunity to examine it. I may vote for it, yet it does seem to me rather hard to call upon us to vote upon it this morning. I should be sorry to vote in such a way as to do injustice to or cast in the slightest degree a stigma upon the officers of the Navy, whom I so highly esteem, but I shall vote, if I can, to put this bill into the hands of the Committee of the Whole, and to have it printed, so that we may have an opportunity to consider it. It is not enough to be told that the Naval Committee have considered it fully. That is enough to start with in the House; we require that to begin with; but we certainly do not expect that we shall accept a bill simply because a committee have approved it. We will consider it when it comes before us with that approval, and we will give that approval due weight. But it is not only our right but our duty to ourselves to scrutinize every bill that comes before us.

Mr. STEVENS. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin appeal to our sense of justice in this matter, and I now appeal to him in the same spirit, and ask him why he should object to conferring upon those medical officers of a similar scale of service the assimilated rank which Congress has conferred upon the officers of the line for the last six years. *As a question of justice, I say here without fear of successful contradiction, that the principle of this bill is founded in immutable justice, and should it not prevail here to-day it will be pursued and followed until justice shall have its full sway, and these officers of the medical staff shall stand, not in subordination to officers of the line, but on a scale of equality.

Now, sir, in regard to alleged injustice done to the Army, does not the gentleman know that the rank of brigadier general has been conferred upon the representative of the medical staff in the Army? With only ten brigadier generals in the Army we have conferred upon the medical staff one of those positions, while in the Navy there are ninety-nine commodores on the active and retired list; and we ask, as a matter of justice, that twelve of the medical staff shall have their rank raised from captain to that of commodore.

Let me say here, in order to obviate all apprehension, that this rank of commodore is not in fact exactly and practically assimilated to that of brigadier general. It is well known that before the war the highest rank in the Navy was captain. Now there has been added to that the rank of commodore, of rear admiral, of vice admiral, and of full admiral. As regards the expense, let me say that the whole additional expense of these promotions will not exceed $2,000 a year, exclusive of the increased pay of the assistant surgeons.

I refer once more, as an indication of what the line officers think of this as a matter of compromise between the line and staff on that controverted question, to the letter of Admiral Farragut just read, in which he gives his full approval of the bill, with the amendment that it shall not be in operation during any period of war.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask a question. I have not examined this bill, but I would like to know how many squadrons we now have in the Navy?

Mr. STEVENS. I am not prepared to say how many.

Mr. LOGAN. I would ask the gentleman how many commodores are required to command squadrons?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not understand that any commodores are required to command squadrons. And I desire to say here, in this connection that under the practice of the Navy a commodore is now commander of a ship, when before the war he was commander of a squadron, being the rank, as I understand, given by courtesy and not existing in fact.

Mr. LOGAN. How many ships of war have we?

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will be kind enough to state the object of his criticism perhaps I can answer his questions without taking so much loss of time.

Mr. LOGAN. The object is perfectly apparent. We have more commodores than we have commands for them. What I was going to remark was this: when the war closed it was a very convenient time to increase the rank in the Army and Navy. But I think the time has passed for doing anything of that kind. We have an Army with one officer of the rank of brigadier general in charge of the medical department. Now, if you desire to give this rank to the medical officer of the Navy you ought to make it to correspond to the Army. So far as I am concerned, I have not examined the bill, but I should certainly be opposed to passing a bill increasing the rank of anybody at this time, either in the Army or Navy, without full deliberation in the House.

It is said that this will increase the pay but a very small amount. Well, the provisions of this bill may not do it, but we all ought to have experience enough to know that whenever you give rank, either in the Army or in the Navy, under your law, and the officers are assigned to duties corresponding to their rank, they receive pay corresponding to their rank, and it is the easiest matter in the world to get that assignment. In nearly every instance they are assigned to duties corresponding to their rank. This matter of increasing rank in the Army and Navy is a very easy thing when it first passes, but in a very short time you find the amount of money that is drawn from the Treasury in consequence of it.

Now, I do not know, as was said by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] but that I might possibly be willing to vote for a bill something of this character; I will not say that I would not; but I would certainly prefer that the bill should be referred to the Committee of the Whole, where it can be thoroughly examined, because it is a more important subject than gentlemen may imagine.

Mr. O'NEILL. There has been no ground stated why this bill should be postponed or why it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If it should be so referred I doubt if it will ever get into the House again, and these gentlemen in the naval service who I think have been neglected by Congress, these surgeons in the Navy, who, I am sure, deserve some regard from this body, will never reach what they so much desire, and what, I believe, will be of great benefit to the service.

The conferring of the rank of commodore or captain upon these officers does not bring them increased pay. As the gentleman who has charge of this bill has stated to the House, the actual expense to the Government in increased pay will not amount to $2,000 per annum. I think that is nearly a correct estimate; in fact, I have heard from two or three surgeons of the Navy who have been long in the service, and whom I know well and highly esteem, that the actual expense, if the bill should pass in its present form, would be only about sixteen hundred dollars per annum greater than it now is.

I understand the Navy is not to have an enlarged corps of surgeons. There is to be no addition to any of the present different grades. The assignment of one of these gentlemen as commodore to a ship could only be a temporary assignment, if such could be made at all, and that for a very limited period, and he would not draw the pay of a commodore. The object is simply to reorganize the corps so as to give these officers positions corresponding to the positions which we have given to many officers of the Army. I hope the House will act on the bill this morning and not allow dilatory motions to throw it, perhaps, beyond its reach.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] now yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS. For how long?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not confine me to any specific time. He knows that he can have as much time as he wants, as this bill must be disposed of before the House passes from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield the gentleman fifteen minutes, which is more time than has been occupied by any friend of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not confine me to fifteen minutes. It will do him no injustice to allow me more time.

I desire to say, in the first place, that I took up this bill to examine it with some hope that I might be able to support it. I was called upon by medical gentlemen whom I know, who were interested in this bill, who presented their case to me, and I agreed to examine into it and give it my support if I could do so consistently with the sense of duty I owe to the public.

Upon an examination of the bill, however, I find it one that I cannot support; and I may say here in passing, that we all know the influence which is so apt to control us in all matters which affect individuals. We all know how we listen to appeals from individuals, and how desirous we are to serve our friends who are about us, and this is, perhaps, one of those cases.

But I wish to call the attention of the House to some provisions of this bill which we are now asked to pass in a single morning hour. It is a long bill of four sections, which has not yet been printed, and which the Committee on Naval Affairs have reported here and ask us at once to put upon its passage. While the country is demanding a decrease both of the Army and Navy and a curtailment of the vast expenses of those branches of the service, here is a bill which, as I read it, is very different from what my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] asserts, and which I shall show will add vastly to the expenses of the Government by creating new grades of officers, for it proposes the creation of such new grades to an extent which must arrest the attention of the members of this House and the country.

I will first call the attention of the House to the provisions of the second section of the bill. It creates twelve medical inspectors, each with the pay, rank, and emoluments of a commodore of the Navy; eighteen medical directors, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a captain; twenty deputy medical directors, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a commander; and thirty surgeons, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant commander; and one hundred and twenty assistant surgeons—including the assistant surgeons now in the Navy—each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a master; provided that assistant surgeons of three years' service who have been found qualified for promotion by a competent board of examiners shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenants. Now, the act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy, approved July 16, 1862, fixes the grades of officers of the Navy and assimilates them to grades in the Army. Rear admirals of the same relative rank as major generals, the commodores with brigadier generals, captains with colonels, commanders with lieutenant colonels, lieutenant commanders with majors, lieutenants with captains, masters with first lieutenants, and ensigns with second lieutenants.

In looking over the bill it will be seen that the number of medical officers of high rank proposed by this bill is entirely in excess of the wants of the service, and will largely increase the expense without any corresponding increase of efficiency. There is no proper duty in our small Navy for so large a number of medical officers of high rank, and it is simply absurd to make commodores (brigadier generals) to take charge of petty hospitals with a half dozen sick. And how many commodores have we now in the Navy with the pay and emoluments of that rank? I understand there are about one hundred. And this with a naval force limited by law to eight thousand five hundred men; and with an Army of sixty to seventy thousand men we have only thirteen brigadier generals, which is the assimilated rank to commodore. In the medical corps of the Army of this great number of men they had only one surgeon general with the rank of brigadier general, and two inspector generals; and that was the permanent establishment during the war. Now, with our Army of sixty to eighty thousand men, we have only one surgeon general with the rank of brigadier general, one assistant surgeon general with the rank of colonel, and five medical purveyors with the rank of lieutenant colonel. In face of this fact, as regards the Army, it seems incredible that we should be asked to add twelve more commodores or twelve more brigadier generals to the number we already have in the Navy. Add to this the other medical officers created by this bill and we shall have more medical officers in our Navy than Great Britain has with a navy of one hundred thousand men.

Now, the question in the first case arises, is there any necessity, does the public service require it, for the establishment of this additional number of commodores or brigadier generals in the Navy of the United States? If not, then the only question is, shall we legislate for the benefit of these individuals, shall we make twelve new commodores or brigadier generals in order to satisfy the very just ambition of very excellent men, I may say, for I have nothing to say against the surgeons of the Navy. I believe them to be men of intelligence, of honor, and of medical skill, who deserve well of their country, and who, even as matters now stand, I cannot but believe are well treated by their country.

Now, sir, what I contend is that it will be seen upon an examination of this bill that the number of medical officers of high rank proposed is entirely in excess of the wants of the service, and will largely increase the expenses of the Government without giving the service any more efficiency. There is no proper duty in our small Navy for so large a number of medical officers of high rank.

The gentleman from New Hampshire has spoken in regard to these surgeons. Now, I ask the House what rights have these men over the paymasters and engineers? If you give this proposed advance of rank to your surgeons you will be bound in consistency and justice to confer the same rank upon your paymasters and your engineers. If this bill should pass we must, if we are to be consistent, follow it with another bill for paymasters and engineers. Thus we should have a navy which would be very much like Artemus Ward's regiment, composed entirely of brigadier generals. We should then have on the active and the retired list an army of officers of high rank drawing high pay.

The gentleman from New Hampshire does not seem to remember that this is a time of peace, when the country demands a diminution instead of an increase in the number of officers in both Army and Navy. The naval surgeons in their petition to Congress say that this bill provides for no increase of medical officers, but they fail to say what will be the amount of the increased compensation; for they claim not only the rank, but the emoluments of the grades to which they seek to be advanced. Now, the gentleman from New Hampshire has said—and the statement was reiterated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] who came to his rescue—that this measure will involve an increased expense of only $1,600. Upon that point I take issue with the gentleman. This matter has been examined by an expert, and he makes a very different report.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman give me the name of the expert?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I could give the name to the gentleman privately; and when I might do so he will acknowledge that the authority is good. And, sir, the very language of the bill bears out my statement. These commodores are to have the rank, pay, and emoluments belonging to that rank, and that means additional compensation. The increase of expense in the medical department of the Navy will be $40,000 a year. There will be the same increase in the pay and engineer departments of the Navy, as those officers will claim the same privileges as the surgeons, and have already bills before Congress, and if granted the whole extra expense will be $120,000 per annum. This amount in ten years would build us two magnificent steam frigates.

Now, sir, it is stated that unless this measure be adopted there will be a difficulty in obtaining medical officers, owing to the want of higher rank in the medical corps. This, I am assured, is a mistake. I understand that if all the surgeons, paymasters, and engineers should leave the naval service to-morrow their places could be filled in forty-eight hours with the best ability of the country. The pay and rank are now such that, as I am told, competent and skillful surgeons would be glad to take the places of these men, and would be glad to have the opportunity to accept and discharge the duties of those positions.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, as a commentary on the gentleman's statement, which is doubtless correct in theory, I wish to mention the fact that there are now fifty-five vacancies in the medical corps of the Navy, although circulars have been addressed to all the graduating medical colleges. Those places cannot be filled. The degradation of the medical corps of the Navy by the advancement of line officers four grades and withholding advancement from the medical staff has brought it to such a condition that you cannot get any graduates of medical colleges to take commissions as medical officers in the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The fifteen minutes allowed to the gentleman from Illinois have now expired.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to his time being extended.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My information differs from the information of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania. I have heard no complaint from the Admiral of the Navy that we had not sufficient medical officers to supply our ships.

Mr. STEVENS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I have official information there are fifty-five vacancies in the medical corps of the Navy; and this arises exactly from the condition of things described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with the outside additional obstacle of want of prospective promotion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but there may be these vacancies. I trust there are, and that they will continue, because we now have medical officers enough in the Navy for the purposes of the Government. If, then, we do not need these officers, there surely can be no reason why we should pass this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would be glad if my friend from Illinois would inform the House what is the pay now received by the medical officers of the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have not a Navy Register before me. I suppose the gentleman from New Hampshire has.

Mr. STEVENS. The highest pay now given to a medical officer in the Navy is to a fleet surgeon, being $3,300. This bill abolishes fleet surgeons, about seven of them, and leaves the pay of the highest officer at $3,200.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Now, it will be found by reference to the memorial of the surgeons that they refer to the rank of medical officers in the British navy, and claim that the senior is a vice admiral. There is no such rank in the medical corps of that navy. The regulations say that "after three years service, or full pay as such, inspector generals of hospitals and fleets may rank with rear admirals according to date of completion of service stated." Now there are only seven inspector generals of hospitals, &c., in the whole of the great British navy on the active list, which has in commission over seventy thousand men. There is no proof in the British Navy Register that any of these officers rank with rear admirals; five of them are merely honorary surgeons to the queen. These are high officers in the British navy who never go to sea, and after all are merely honorary titles for attendance on the queen. As we have no queen the case does not apply to us at all.

By the law of Congress of 1846 the rank of surgeons was defined as follows: surgeons of the fleet and surgeons of over twelve years rank with commander; surgeons under twelve years rank with lieutenant; passed assistant surgeons rank next after lieutenant; assistant surgeons rank next after master. This is the rank under which they claim to be laboring now. The facts of the case are these: the chief of bureau ranks with commodore; the fleet surgeon ranks with captain, no matter how short a time he has been a surgeon; surgeons of fifteen years rank with captain; surgeons after first five years rank with commander; surgeons for the first five years rank with lieutenant commander, &c. This is a higher rank than is held by any surgeons in any navy in the world. The Navy Department, without any authority of law, advanced the medical officers one grade, and in some cases two, and this applied to the pay and engineer officers as well.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman whether a fleet surgeon is not a ward-room officer; and whether, although forty years in the service, he must not go among the pigsties and chicken-coops on the forward deck to smoke his pipe, if he should indulge in such a luxury, and must not sleep with youth of the age of his grandchildren in a room in common? We ask by this bill to give him such rank as will, in view of his long service, his probably distinguished service, let him escape from the society of the boys of the Navy, and the confinement of the ward-room, from which the lieutenant commander escapes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know much about the regulations of men of war. I have never been in the service, as I presume my distinguished friend on the Committee on Naval Affairs has; but I know this—

Mr. PAINE. I would like to ask my friend if he refers to midshipmen when he speaks of boys?

Mr. KELLEY. I do, sir.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to ask further whether a midshipman is a ward-room officer.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe all are ward-room officers until they get to the position of lieutenant commanders, when they enjoy their several rooms.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. If he supports this bill for the purpose of preventing ward-room officers from sleeping with the boys, I want him to tell me what he is going to do with the boys. With whom will they sleep? [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Very well; I will answer. As the boy advances in years of service and dignity I would do what the Government does with the line officers, advance his comforts; not as you do with your medical staff, keep them, though they be sixty years of age, still the associates of the young graduates succeeding from year to year from your Naval Academy. I would give to the venerable physician, the fleet surgeon, that position which would entitle him to his separate room and his hour of privacy—his ability to perform his clerical duties by the light of day, and not keep him in that dark part of the ship, which the sun and the daylight never penetrate. That is what I would do with boy and man.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to be drawn off from the merits of the bill to discuss this outside question very much. We have had a Navy for a great many years; a Navy that went through the war of 1812 and the war of the rebellion; a Navy that has won glory and honor, and I never heard of these great complaints of putting a surgeon in the ward-room, which the gentleman designates as a "pig-sty."

Mr. KELLEY. I beg pardon; I said if he wanted to smoke his pipe he must go to the forward deck among the hen coops and pigsties to do it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is a very good place to smoke a pipe. [Laughter.] That, then, is the complaint—that the doctors are not permitted to smoke in the ward-room among the boys, as he calls them, and they are compelled to associate with the "boys." Who are these "boys" that the gentleman alludes to? They are the young men whom the members of this House send to the naval school, the sons of our constituents. Now, I undertake to say that the boys we send to Annapolis are equal to any of these medical gentlemen, without any disparagement to the medical officers of the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman whether he thinks these boys are his equal in years, and whether he would like to be doomed day after day, month after month, and year after year to have no other associates than boys of the age of those who graduate from the naval school. I make no reflection upon boys. Were it not for them we would have few such able men as the gentleman from Illinois, who was once a boy himself but is one no longer. According to the Scripture he has left boyish things behind him, and I think he would not like to be doomed by law to a constant association with them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not care to continue this discussion any longer. So far as the association of boys is concerned I would be entirely willing and satisfied to associate with the young men I have had the honor to send to the naval school, and who have graduated with distinction and are an honor to their profession.

Mr. KELLEY. The question relates to association with youth of their age from year to year, generation to generation?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will not take up the time of the House much longer. As I said, I have not had time to arrange or digest my remarks. I have looked over the bill and jotted down some things that have occurred to me in regard to its provisions, and have become convinced that it ought not to pass. There are other suggestions which have been made touching this bill which I deem worthy of consideration.

Mr. STEVENS. Are they from the same authority?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Not the same, but equally good. We give to subordinates who are mere adjuncts of the Navy, whose responsibilities are departmental and particular, and which are covered altogether by the responsibilities of their commander and principal, an equal rank with him! The captain of a man-of-war acting under confidential instructions of his Government, negotiating with Governments of other countries, holding peace and war in his discretion, men and guns under his control, the honor of his flag to sus-tain, the keeper and preserver of all the lives and property placed under his orders by his Government; who cares for and controls the surgeon and his sick and his medicines; who is responsible for the paymaster himself as well as his money chest; who governs the engineer and all under him, is placed there by the Government because his professional education has trained him for the place of command which cannot be filled by a doctor, a paymaster, or an engineer. This captain, so important to his country, is furnished with a ship and guns and a crew wherewith to execute the will of his Government. Incidental to the crew is a doctor to heal the sick, a paymaster to pay the crew and issue the provisions and clothing, an engine-driver to drive the engine. These are all, in the first instance, responsible to the captain to execute his orders, and if they fail he suspends their functions, and regulates when and how they shall perform them. His responsibility covers them all, and all that is done on board his vessel.

Make the doctor, the paymaster, the engineer, the equals of the captain nominally or really, and what comes of it? Is there any one who does not know that anarchy, confusion, insubordination, which are the utter destruction of the Navy, must follow. The Navy was created and maintained for well-known purposes. Destroy its discipline and the power of an officer to control those under his command and all those purposes are frustrated. Here, with your ship under the command of a captain, you by this bill put on board the ship as doctor a superior officer of the rank of commodore.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the provision of the bill which says in so many words that no medical staff officer shall exercise any such command as that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand that well; but he is an officer of superior rank in the ship, and drawing higher pay than the man who commands the ship. That does not seem to me to be right, and such a state of things would be destructive of all discipline and lead to ill feeling and bad blood and general insubordination. There are other objections, but I have no time to state them. It seems to me those already suggested are quite sufficient, and I hope the House will now pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until to-morrow.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries; when the Speaker signed the same.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th instant, copies of the reports of the special commissioners upon the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, and the Sioux City and Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence for one week was granted to Mr. ROBINSON, on account of a death in his family.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Election Frauds in New York asks authority that the evidence taken by the committee may be printed for the use of the committee as taken, so that they may report the evidence in print. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection; and the order was made.

PILOTS AND PILOT REGULATIONS.

Mr. FLANDERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1591) repealing an act passed by the Legislature of Washington Territory, relating to pilots and pilot regulations; which was read a first and second time, and, with an accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1590) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL ROUTE IN ALABAMA.

Mr. HAUGHEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1592) to change the time for carrying the mails on route No. 7177, between Fulton, Mississippi, and Frankfort, Alabama; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

TAXES ON SPIRITS AND TOBACCO.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1593) to modify portions of section twenty of the act approved July 20, 1868, entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the pension bill. Before doing so, I move that when the House shall proceed to the consideration of that bill in Committee of the Whole all general debate upon it shall terminate in half an hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 1564, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1870.

The bill was read at length. It appropriates the following sums, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870: for invalid pensions under various acts, $10,000,000; for pensions of widows, children, mothers, fathers, brothers, and sisters of soldiers, as provided for by acts of March 18, 1818; May 15, 1828; June 7, 1832; July 4, 1836; July 7, 1838; March 3, 1843; June 17, 1844; February 2, 1847, and July 29, 1848; February 8, 1858; June 8, 1858; and July 14, 1862, with its supplementary acts, and for compensation to pension agents and expenses of agencies, $13,000,000; and for Navy pensions to invalids, widows and children, and other relatives of the officers and men of the Navy dying in the line of duty, now provided by law, $250,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in proceeding to the consideration of the first in the series of regular appropriation bills to be considered, it may not be deemed inappropriate to submit to the House some observations on the character and extent of the appropriations necessary for the support of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and other cognate matters.

It must be a matter of profound congratulation to all good citizens that the time is now come when the attention of the people can be given in a greater degree to the material and vital interests of the country. A gigantic rebellion suppressed; the curse of human slavery abolished; the rebellious States reconstructed, or in the process of reconstruction, on the basis of equal rights before the law to all; a loyal administration of the country secured for the next four years; the bitterness of party feeling assuaged, the earnest attention of the American people will now be turned to questions of the internal administration of the country.

The excitement and passions growing out of the war and out of the contests connected therewith will die away with the lapse of time and the people will compel Congress to confront other and different questions than those which have for so many years overshadowed and swallowed up everything else. With the unreconstructed States admitted into the Union, with full and equal protection for all men in all the States, and with MANHOOD SUFFRAGE secured by legislation or constitutional amendment, the minds of the people will turn to questions of finance, of taxes, of economy, of decreased expenditures, and honest and enlightened legislation, to questions of tariffs, and to questions of railroad, telegraph, and express monopolies, which are sucking the very life-blood of the people, to the administration of the revenue laws and to the robberies and plunderings of the Treasury by dishonest office-holders.

Already the eyes of the people of this country are upon Congress. I may say they are upon the Republican majority in Congress, for that majority is now responsible before the country for the legislation of Congress. It can make and unmake laws in defiance and contempt of Executive vetoes. The Republican party triumphed in the last election because it was pledged to honesty and economy, to the upholding of public faith and public credit, and to the faithful execution of the laws. And those pledges cannot now be ignored without subjecting that party to the censure of the people.

The condition of the country, the vast public debt, the weight of taxation, the depreciated and fluctuating currency, the enormous expenditures of public money, the mal-administration of the Government, the extortions of monopolies, press upon our attention with most crushing force. The people elected General Grant to the Presidency not only on account of the great and inestimable services he has rendered the country in subduing the rebellion; not only on account of his devotion to the great principles of the Republican party, but because they believe him to be emphatically an honest man and an enlightened statesman, who would faithfully administer the laws without fear, favor, or affection.

The time has come when we are imperatively called upon to take a new departure. Added to other terrible evils brought upon the country by the war for the suppression of the rebellion, is the demoralization incident to all great wars and to the expenditures of vast and unheard-of amounts of public money; to the giving out of immense contracts by which sudden and vast fortunes were made, the inflation of the currency, which engendered speculation, profligacy, extravagance, and corruption, by the intense desire to get suddenly rich out of the Government and without labor, and the inventions and schemes generally to get money out of the Treasury for the benefit of individuals without regard to the interests of the Government.

While the restless and unpausing energies of a patriotic and incorruptible people were devoted to the salvation of their Government, and they were pouring out their blood and treasure in its defense, there was the vast army of the base, the venal, and unpatriotic, who rushed in to take advantage of the misfortunes of the country and to plunder its Treasury. The statute-books are loaded with legislation which will impose burdens on future generations. Public land enough to make empires has been voted to private railroad corporations; subsidies of untold millions of bonds, for the same purposes, have become a charge upon the people, while the fetters of vast monopolies have been fastened still closer and closer upon the public.

It is time that the Representatives of the people were admonished that they are the servants of the people and are paid by the people; that their constituents have confided to them the great trust of guarding their rights and protecting their interests; that their position and their power are to be used for the benefit of the people whom they represent, and not for their own benefit and the benefit of the lobbyists, the gamblers, and the speculators who have come to Washington to make a raid upon the Treasury. The time has also come, in my judgment, when public men are to be held to a more strict accountability, to a more strict discharge of their duty, and when their actions will be scanned by a more critical eye. It is no new lesson that the public men of this country must learn. It is a lesson which has been taught in other countries and at times even when there was little to boast of in the way of public virtue.

It is recorded in history that during the most terrible days of the French revolution, for it was on the 14th of May, 1793, nineteen days before the passage of the celebrated decree of the national convention on the 2d of June, placing in accusation the Girondists, that Buzot, one of the purest and most eminent of those gifted and brilliant men, pronounced these memorable words, which should be engraved in letters of gold over the entrance of every public office and of every hall of legislation:

"No public man can be justified in profiting from the information and advantages of his position. It is his duty to consecrate exclusively to the public interest the knowledge which such position furnishes to him."

Much is expected of the new Administration, and the public expectation will not be disappointed. But as much as General Grant can do, and as much as he will do in his own sphere of action, it is idle to suppose that he can do everything that the country requires to be done to secure those reforms in the public service which are so imperatively demanded. As President, General Grant must have the earnest and cordial support of the other branches of the Government, particularly of the legislative branch. The responsibility of this Congress, so far as the next Administration is concerned, is complete.

We can water-log the ship of State before the President-elect takes command. We can make appropriations and incur liabilities which will go over to the next Administration, which cannot be met by the current revenues and can only be met by imposing additional taxation on the people. We can destroy the confidence of the people in the wisdom, integrity, and purity of the Republican party by yielding to the insatiable demands of the cormorants who have gathered about us and who make requisitions upon us which, if yielded to, will destroy, and ought to destroy, any party. By our recklessness and extravagance we can make appropriations of land and money which will destroy the national credit and make our country an object of scorn to the civilized world.

With neither money nor credit, unable to command respect at home or abroad, we will be held in contempt by the weakest and most pusillanimous nations. Never has the country in time of peace looked to Congress with more intense interest than at the present time. The demand of the great masses of our constituents, the bone and sinew of the country, the men who have no schemes of plunder, and who desire only an honest administration of the Government, the men who fought the battles of the Republic and poured out their blood in its defense, they require of us a decrease of our expenditures and a reduction of taxation. Regardless of the mysteries of finance they see that our credit can be improved, the public faith vindicated, a return to specie payments made certain, a reduction of the interest on the public debt secured, by keeping down the expenditures of the Government to the lowest possible point, and by the honest collection of the revenues.

It is for Congress to keep down the expenditures, and it is for the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed and that the revenues are collected; but it is for Congress to see also that they do not keep the fetters upon the limbs of the President so as to render it impossible for him to faithfully execute the laws.

It is well to recur to the total expenditures of the Government for the last three years, and it is encouraging to observe that they have been gradually decreased:

In 1865-66 they were.....	$520,000,000
In 1866-67 they were.....	346,000,000
In 1867-68 they were.....	333,000,000
In 1867-68 they were, exclusive of bounties	334,000,000
In 1867-68, or inclusive of bounties ($43,- 000,000).....	377,000,000
In 1868-69 they are estimated, exclusive of bounties, at.....	310,000,000
In 1868-69, or inclusive of bounties ($26,- 000,000).....	336,000,000
For the next fiscal year, 1869-70, these are estimated at.....	303,000,000 and this latter estimate the committee believe will be materially reduced.

The amount for bounties is not properly chargeable to the expenditures of the Government; and it is a matter of congratulation that there are no bounties estimated for the coming fiscal year 1869-70.

The amount voted for deficiencies for the year 1867-68 was $15,000,000, and that amount is included in the total of expenditures for that fiscal year.

The amount called for as deficiencies for the present fiscal year, and which is included in the total of expenditures as given above, is $21,000,000.

It is worthy of note that on the 2d day of December, 1867, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the appropriations required—

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.....	$372,000,000
On the 6th of December, 1868, he states that	the expenditures for the first quarter of the same fiscal year were.....	$105,000,000
He estimates for the next	three quarters an expenditure of.....	231,000,000

Total, including interest and deficiencies..... 336,000,000

Expenditure less than estimated by the Secretary of..... $36,000,000

DEFICIENCIES.

And I now proceed to the consideration of the interesting question of what this Congress will be called upon to appropriate for deficiencies for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and to carry on the Government for the next fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

First, as to the estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury "of additional appropriations required to complete the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and previous years." It is for Congress to inquire rigidly into the necessity and propriety of voting these deficiencies, which the Secretary estimates at the enormous sum of $21,000,000. Of this amount $14,000,000 is for the Army, necessitated, in a great measure, by a consuming Indian war, which is entailing extraordinary expenses on the Government. The next current amount is the estimated deficiency for the Post Office Department of over four and a half million dollars, incurred by extravagant contracts for unjustifiably extended mail service.

Then there is the scandalous estimate of nearly $665,000 for deficiencies for public buildings where we were promised that the large amounts we appropriated last year should finish the buildings. Add this amount of $665,000 demanded as a deficiency for this fiscal year to the amount demanded for the same purpose for the next fiscal year of $2,434,000, makes $3,099,000 which we are asked to vote for public buildings at this session of Congress. And in the present state of the Treasury, or, indeed, in any state of the Treasury, I feel bound to denounce it as one of the most extravagant, unjustifiable, and profligate expenditures of the public money ever asked of Congress. There are other deficiencies which have been made, and which we are called upon to make up, that are without justification if it be considered that Congress has any power over the public Treasury. In view of the state of our finances, and deeming it indispensably necessary to reduce our expenditures for the present year in every way possible, and in full light of all the facts, Congress appropriated a given amount—which was $450,000—for the Coast Survey for this year.

In contempt of the action of Congress a deficiency in that appropriation of $160,000 is now demanded, not one dollar of which, I trust, will be voted. The Columbian Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, a private institution in this District, which has obtained nearly half a million dollars out of the Government, was given $12,500 for this fiscal year for instruction, &c., which was deemed ample and even generous; but with a familiarity of the whole action of Congress on this subject, the president of this private corporation, with unparalleled effrontery, arraigns Congress for its action and demands of us $17,500 more as a deficiency for this year!

There are other deficiencies estimated for which will be scrutinized by the Appropriation Committee before it reports any bill. But one thing is clear, if Congress cannot control the expenditures of the Government, if it cannot curb the executive officers of the Government in spending the public money, and if such officers are to be left practically to determine the appropriations, then, I say, let Congress abdicate, and let the people be saved the expense of keeping up this expensive and somewhat ornamental institution.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1870.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the following appropriations as necessary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870:

For civil service, including the expenses of foreign intercourse, internal revenue, courts, loans, public domain, deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department, and all other expenditures except for pensions, Indian, and the War and Navy Departments.....	$45,140,825 60
For pensions.....	23,250,000 00
For Indian department.....	2,940,382 70
For Army proper.....	52,184,781 97
For Military Academy.....	334,388 88
For armory and fortifications.....	4,684,200 00
For harbor and river improvements, public buildings, &c.....	8,486,018 00
For naval establishment.....	20,993,414 59
	$158,014,011 74

To the estimates are added statements showing, first, the appropriations estimated for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, made by former acts of Congress, of a specific and indefinite character, as follows:

For miscellaneous objects, including the ex-	penditures of collecting the revenue from cus-
oms.....	$9,749,000 00
For compensation to the Post Office
Department for mail services.....	703,000 00
For civilization of Indians.....	10,000 00
For arming and equipping the militia.....	200,000 00
For interest on the public debt.....	128,690,676 00
	$139,349,676 00

2. The estimated balances of existing appropriations which will be unexpended on June 30, 1869, part of which are required for the payment of the liabilities of the present fiscal year, but which will not be drawn from the Treasury until after June 30, 1869, are as follows:

For the civil service, &c.....	$9,907,636 63
For pensions and Indians.....	24,568,831 49
For War Department.....	20,905,291 44
For Navy Department.....	12,951,043 76
	68,322,803 37

It is estimated that of this sum there will not be required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870..... 62,686,491 11

Total estimated expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1870..... $303,000,000 00

It will be thus seen that $303,000,000 is the amount asked for, and it is for Congress to determine how much of that sum it is absolutely necessary to appropriate to carry on the Government. How much will it be? I will let the permanent appropriations stand as in the Secretary's estimate, though I believe the amount of interest on the public debt is overstated $2,000,000. That amount is $128,690,676, which we must regard as fixed and definite. Then there is the other amount of $158,014,011 74, made up of the items as set out in the estimate. The question recurs how much can this amount be reduced without detriment to the public service? It is now impossible for me to state how much the first item for $45,000,000 can be reduced, as the Appropriation Committee has not yet proceeded far enough in the consideration of the various amounts making up the sum.

But we shall report a reduction of more than $100,000 from what was asked for the expenses of foreign intercourse, and nearly $1,000,000 from what is asked to go into the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. Pensions, Indian department, and Army proper must remain about the same as stated in the estimates. Military Academy we reduce nearly $50,000 on the estimates. For armory and fortifications $4,684,200 are asked, and I believe we can get along with $1,500,000. For harbor and river improvements and public buildings $8,486,018. In my judgment $3,000,000 will be as much as Congress would wish to appropriate under both of those heads. For the naval establishment $20,993,414 59 are estimated. But in the Navy bill already prepared this is reduced to about $16,000,000, which, it is believed, will answer every purpose.

Here are some $15,000,000 which it is thought can be cut off from the estimates of the total expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1870, of $303,000,000, as submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. That will leave for the total expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $288,000,000. Add to that $2,000,000 more for various other expenditures, and we have a total of $290,000,000. It is my belief that the expenditures can be kept down to that point, and that the Government can be administered for that sum, and if that can be done, as it ought to be done, a good showing can be made.

I have made no estimate in relation to the revenue for the next fiscal year, but for the present fiscal year it appears from the Secretary's report that the actual revenues received for the first quarter amount to $95,000,392, and that the Secretary estimates the next three quarters at $246,000,000, making the total estimate of the Secretary $341,000,000. But Mr. Wells, Special Commissioner of the Revenue, who has given this matter great attention, estimates that it will reach $355,000,000, being $15,000,000 more than the estimate of the Secretary.

Assuming, therefore, that we shall not collect more revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, than the Secretary estimates we shall collect for the present fiscal year, and assuming that our expenditures will not exceed $290,000,000 there will be a surplus of $51,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1870. But with an honest collection of the revenue, and without any increase of taxes, I think we can collect $450,000,000 of revenue. If this can be done and our expenditures can be kept even within $300,000,000 we will show a surplus at the end of the fiscal year 1870 of $150,000,000.

With an exhibit of this character, which is an exhibit that can be made if Congress and the Executive shall act in harmony to that great end, the credit of the Government will be established on an enduring basis, our bonds will go to par in Europe, greenbacks will approximate gold in value; taxes may then be reduced, and the country will enter on a career of prosperity, glory, and power without parallel in the history of nations.

I add a table, just handed me, which illustrates what I have said in regard to receipts and expenditures:

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill has now terminated.

Mr. WOOD. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has made some remarks which we on this side of the House think should receive some notice and reply, I ask unanimous consent to have the time for general debate extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done in Committee of the Whole, as it was the order of the House that all general debate upon this bill shall terminate in half an hour.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has spoken more than half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. But a minute or two, only enough to enable him to conclude a paragraph. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] can obtain the opportunity he desires by moving an amendment, as the bill is now open to amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Then I move to amend this bill by striking out the first paragraph, for the purpose of making a few remarks.

This House always listens with a great deal of interest, if not with pleasure, to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. But whatever interest has heretofore attached to anything emanating from that quarter has an additional importance at this time, in view of the supposed connection between that gentleman and the incoming Administration. We suppose that the labored and prepared speech which he has just delivered upon the condition of the country, and the necessity for the introduction of great reforms, especially in legislation as well as in administration, more particularly with reference to some details which the gentleman has reported to this committee, we suppose that we are justified in regarding his speech as a sort of introductory message, laying the foundation for the policy of the next Administration. In that view, which I think we are warranted in taking, anything emanating from that gentleman is entitled to a great deal of consideration by this House and by the country.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has stated that the administration of General Grant has been created by the people—if I quote him correctly, and I speak only from memory—not only in consequence of the eminent services that General Grant has rendered the country, but also for the purpose of carrying out great reforms in the public affairs of the country. Now, sir, I am sure that I speak the sentiment of the minority upon this side of the House when I say that so far as the administration of General Grant shall in good faith either initiate or carry out any reform we will heartily respond to it, and we will give that administration, to that extent, our support in the Forty-First Congress.

The country wants reform; not reform in speeches merely, not reform in promises alone, but substantial reform, not only by a curtailment of the expenses of the Government, but by the adoption of measures which will restore harmony and promote the general pacification of the country. Sir, we want something more than mere professions. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] himself made a speech here yesterday against a measure reported by a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and subsequently voted for the measure. I trust that is not the spirit which is to actuate the gentleman with reference to the next Administration. This House and the country require something more than mere profession.

The gentleman has also stated that Congress has the power to bring about reforms, and that it is the duty of the Executive to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Now, that gentleman and his friends have had full possession of the legislative department of the Government for the last eight years, yet what reform has Congress attempted to initiate? The minority here have been feeble, powerless. We could neither initiate nor carry through either House of Congress any measures looking to reform in the administration of the Government. While the gentleman and his political friends and the friends of the incoming administration have controlled the legislation of Congress, the abuses to which the gentleman has referred have been not only initiated but carried out in the form of acts of Congress. Hence I have risen for the purpose of saying that if the design is to have reform we on this side of the House will sustain General Grant in bringing back peace and harmony to the nation, in restoring gold and silver as the constitutional currency of the country, and in inaugurating a general reform in every department of the Government.

I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For invalid pensions under various acts, $10,000,000. For pensions of widows, children, mothers, fathers, brothers, and sisters of soldiers, as provided for by acts of March 18, 1818; May 15, 1828; June 7, 1832; July 4, 1836; July 7, 1839; March 3, 1843; June 17, 1844; February 2, July 21, and July 29, 1848; February 3, 1858; June 3, 1858; and July 14, 1862, with its supplementary acts, and for compensation to pension agents and expenses of agencies, $13,000,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the paragraph last read by inserting after the words "supplementary acts" the words "and under various special acts." As the bill now stands there is no provision for the payment of pensioners who have been placed on the pension-roll in pursuance of private or special legislation. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is, I think, entirely unnecessary, because there is a permanent appropriation for paying the pensions provided for by private acts. The bill is now in the shape in which all these pension appropriation bills have been passed. It covers everything.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] withdraw the amendment?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; I think it should be adopted. Without it the pensioners under special acts cannot, as I understand, be paid under this bill, which I know is not the intention of the committee or of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to inquire why the committee, in framing this bill, have not complied with the rule which requires that the amount of money appropriated shall be appended to the bill?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The omission was made inadvertently by the clerk of the committee, and I called his attention to it this morning. The bill, as the gentleman will observe, embraces only three items: one of $10,000,000, one of $13,000,000, and one of $250,000, making an aggregate of $23,250,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I move that be appended to the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is not to be added to the bill as a part of the bill, but is appended as a note.

Mr. BROOKS. Add it, then, as a note.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was merely a clerical omission. There are notes to all of the other appropriation bills.

Mr. BROOKS. In the consular and diplomatic bill the note not only states the total amount of the appropriations, but also the amount saved, while we have no note to this bill at all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I not only complied with the rule to state the amount of the appropriations, but, for the benefit of my economical friend from New York, I also stated the amount saved. I now move that the pension bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and that the committee take up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. Of course all points of order are reserved.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read House bill No. 1570, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, the first time for information.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to; and the Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, as follows:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary, ministers, and commissioners of the United States at Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Spain, Austria, Brazil, republic of Mexico, China, Italy, Chili, Peru, Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Turkey, Ecuador, New Granada, Bolivia, Venezuela, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Sandwich Islands, Costa Rica, Honduras, Argentine Confederation, Paraguay, Uruguay, Japan, and Salvador, $316,000.

Mr. BROOKS. This reduces the estimate from $823,025 to $316,000, and I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to state where the reduction takes place?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BROOKS. The estimates of the Department call for $323,025, and the bill appropriates only $316,000, $7,000 less, and I ask on what ground that reduction is made?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Rome, which was estimated for, is left out.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move once more, with a view of arresting the attention of the House, now free, I hope, from all religious prejudice, that the mission to Rome be inserted after "Salvador," and the usual appropriation of $7,500 be made therefor. I trust now, when the presidential election is over and passions, religious as well as political, are calmed down, the House will, as heretofore, vote the usual appropriation for the mission to Rome. I press it upon the ground that the principality of Rome is the headquarters of a large portion of the religious world. Pilgrims go there not only from all parts of the country, but from all quarters of the globe. Our citizens go there not only for religious purposes, but to study the great works of art collected there, for Rome is not only the headquarters of the Roman Catholic religion, but the center of art. I trust, therefore, that the House will make the appropriation for this mission to Rome heretofore made; and that the proposition will have the approval of the gentleman from Illinois. It is much more important than the missions to San Salvador and Nicaragua; and I do not see why we should keep up missions to these small South American republics and abolish the mission to Rome.

Mr. COVODE. I object to the amendment of the gentleman from New York; and as he has referred to the election being over and no occasion for political or religious excitement, I deem it proper now to call the attention of the House to some of the facts connected with the Roman Catholic church, to which he refers, as interfering with elections in several of the States of the Union, and in doing so I will state that that church was used in Pennsylvania and in my own district as an element of power by the Democratic party in disregard of the election laws of Pennsylvania, as was proved before the Legislature of that State a year ago, in the case of Robison vs. Shugart.

I will state here that in my own county the Catholics congregated from other counties and other States to increase the vote of the Democratic party at the monastery, making a majority of nearly one hundred more than their usual vote, and in doing so it was the Catholics who used fraudulent naturalization papers, as I have the testimony to show, and will be ready to present it at the proper time. Many of those papers were signed by J. Ross Snowden, clerk of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and sent into my district, where the names of the parties were inserted without regard to whether they had been in this country a week or five years. We have proved them guilty, and in the whole investigation, from beginning to end, not a Protestant was found among them; they were all Catholics. The same outrages were perpetrated in Fayette county, in my district, and I have the affidavits to show that many votes were polled there on papers issued by said Snowden, dated 9th October, in Philadelphia, to persons belonging to the Catholic church who never saw Philadelphia.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question?

Mr. COVODE. Just a question.

Mr. WOODWARD. Do I understand my colleague to say—

Mr. COVODE. I am not through yet. If the gentleman wants to call my attention to where some of these papers came from, I will say that those used to defeat Colonel Robison for the senate in Pennsylvania purported to be issued in my colleague's own district, at Wilkes-barre, although the coffee stains were put on them in Centre county to give them age. These facts have been proved before the Pennsylvania Legislature, and I will prove some of them as already stated and others similar before the Forty-First Congress.

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not see much chance for my question yet. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has closed on the pending amendment.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move to strike out the last word, and I make the motion for the purpose of saying, in reply to my colleague, that if he charges the church of Rome with the practices he has specified, it is due to a large body of respectable citizens, and to this House, that he produce the evidence that would convict that church of misdemeanor. Now, I allege that the only individual the gentleman has specified as having issued fraudulent naturalization papers is a Presbyterian, a member of the Presbyterian church, to my certain knowledge. I understand my colleague to allege that the church of Rome had issued fraudulent naturalization papers. I demand to know when and where, and upon what authority he makes that assertion.

Mr. COVODE. I said they were used by Catholics exclusively; that all such frauds were perpetrated by them and no others in my district.

Mr. WOODWARD. I certainly do not charge it upon the Presbyterian church; I simply say, in reply to the gentleman, that the individual to whom he alludes as issuing fraudulent naturalization papers is a member, and I believe a deacon, of the Presbyterian church.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate on the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALLISON reported that the committee had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 1564, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1870, and had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment; also that the committee had had under consideration House bill No. 1570, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole to the pension appropriation bill was concurred in; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that when the House shall resolve itself again into the Committee of the Whole all general debate shall be terminated in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move further, before the House goes into the Committee of the Whole, to close the debate on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] in five minutes. I think it is an improper place to discuss the matter; it is not germane.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think it is quite as germane as the gentleman's speech which he made for half an hour.

The question was put on the motion to close debate; and there were—ayes 68, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-nine, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOODWARD. When I was up before, replying to my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Covode,] I omitted to say one thing which I ought to have said. I said that the gentleman to whom he has alluded as issuing fraudulent naturalization papers is a Presbyterian, and not a Romanist. I now wish to say that neither that gentleman nor anybody else implicated, so far as I know, is fairly subject to such a charge or reproach as he suggests. The gentleman to whom he alluded is not only a Presbyterian instead of a Romanist, but he is a man of the highest honor and intelligence, and that he ever set his name to a false or fraudulent certificate is an assertion that would be treated as idle, if not slanderous, in Pennsylvania. He did no such thing. He never did such a thing. The gentleman's defeat for Congress in his district last fall was not the consequence of any such rascality on the part of Mr. Snowden, or anybody else. It is accounted for on other principles than the machinations of the church of Rome, or of the Presbyterian clerk of the supreme court, to whom he alludes. That is the only explanation I desire to make.

Mr. COVODE. My colleague has certainly misunderstood me. It was with regard to the persons who used the papers that I was speaking, and not of those that issued them. Such papers were used in my district. They were sent there in bundles and filled up there. Some of them were filled up on the election ground, and some of them were voted on by persons who had not been in the country two years. I referred to the persons who thus used them. I knew Colonel Snowden well; but I found his name on a large number of those papers issued on the 9th day of October. The papers I referred to bore that date.

Mr. WOODWARD. What had the church of Rome to do with it?

Mr. COVODE. I say they were members of the church of Rome who voted on these papers, and no Protestant was engaged in the business.

Mr. WOODWARD. You began by asserting that the church of Rome did this wrong.

Mr. COVODE. I say they were members of the church of Rome who used the papers that purported to have emanated from my colleague's district and which they coffee-stained, as shown by testimony before the Pennsylvania Legislature to the country, and they were voted by these new Irish. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODWARD. I have shown the gentleman that the man who signed the certificates is a Presbyterian and no Romanist. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. Brooks's amendment.

Mr. JUDD. As I intend to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from New York, I desire to place myself right so that no side issue, either of religion or politics, shall be charged as the motive for my action. I think that the issue between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Covode] and his colleague on the other side [Mr. Woodward] will not govern the members of this House in deciding upon this question. The mission to Rome has now no existence, and the adoption of the amendment would revive it. It is not with me a question of religion or religious tolerance or a question of politics, but it is whether there is any usefulness to the country in reviving this mission or continuing it. Since the territory of that Government has become so limited there is no public necessity for a minister residing at that Court. I do not know of any national interest that requires a diplomatic representative to guard or keep watch over or call for the exercise of the powers of such a mission. I think it is purely an ornamental position, to be dealt out to some pleasant gentleman with good political antecedents and a favorite of the powers that be. A consulate at Rome, with a salary of $1,500, is continued by this bill; and for all practical purposes this grade is high enough to care for all of our interests that may center there. There is nothing that is required to be done at that place by an official of the Government but what can be done by a consul. If we desire to act upon the principle of economy, and to cut off useless expenditures by destroying merely ornamental positions, we might as well begin with the diplomatic service as with any other. I merely arose to say that I shall vote against the amendment, not for the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Covode,] but for the reasons I have given, that it is useless, and not required by the public interest.

The question was then taken upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Brooks; and upon a division there were—ayes 21, noes 63; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. Brooks were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 31, noes 82.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out the word "Turkey." I do so for the purpose of saying, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD,] who himself has held a very high and important diplomatic position, that if the doctrine be right that this Government should be represented only where we have commerce, and where American interests require protection—then I cannot see why we should vote an appropriation to pay for a minister to Turkey, especially when the Government of Turkey has virtually expelled the American minister from its territory. If the majority of this House deny to the oldest Christian Government in the world the consideration of a representative from the United States—I refer to the Government of Rome, the mother of Christianity, then I cannot see why a Christian people, as we profess to be, should continue to send a diplomatic representative to an infidel Government such as that of Turkey.

I want the country to understand that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE,] in the assault which he has made upon the church of Rome, but represents his party. It is but an intimation of what is to come in this country, perhaps before the coming Administration shall close.

Now, if we want to introduce a spirit of economy in the public service I know of no department of it that more requires it than our diplomatic service abroad. We have reformed every department of the Government but that; but we still adhere to the old idea of keeping a representative at the seat of every Government, so that when any particular question arises there may be a minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to settle it. We have a minister in Switzerland. Although it is true that many Americans visit Switzerland, as they also do Rome, we have no commerce with Switzerland, and we never had a single diplomatic question with Switzerland since the foundation of our Government, yet we propose to continue a minister there, although we deny one to Rome, for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] has frankly stated his reasons.

I admire the frankness with which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated the reasons for his action in that respect. He has undoubtedly put the boot upon the right leg. He says he cannot consent to send a minister to Rome because the Government there is the Government of the church of Rome, and he considers the church of Rome responsible for the votes given for the Democratic ticket in this country. Now, if the question of religion is to be made the criterion for our action here, then let us strike at infidelity and not at Christianity; let us say that our Christian Government shall not be represented at Turkey, while we refuse to send a representative to the Christian country of Rome.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that in my action upon this question I am governed neither by Christianity, heathenism, or by infidelity. I do not think that such an element should control our conduct here in determining to what places we should send our diplomatic representatives. Do our interest and those of our people demand the residence of an official clothed with the nation's sovereignty to a certain degree, is the question that is asked in opening diplomatic relations with another country. But I would ask that gentleman, as one of the Representatives of the commercial city of New York, if he can see no difference between the interests of this country as connected with the Government of Turkey and the interests of this country as connected with the Government at Rome? I would ask him whether he intends to say to this House that they stand in respect to the commercial and material interests of the country upon the same platform? If I have rightly observed, they do not.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman desire a reply?

Mr. JUDD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. Well, I will reply by asking the gentleman a question—I believe that is a northern privilege. What commercial interests has the port of New York directly with Turkey?

Mr. JUDD. If I have been credibly informed ships sail from the port of New York to the Hellespont. Ships going from the gentleman's own city trade in most of the ports under the dominion of the Turkish Government. If I am not mistaken in my knowledge of the commerce of the country the city of New York trades largely with different ports under the dominion of Turkey.

Mr. WOOD. Not directly.

Mr. JUDD. Directly to a large extent, unless I am mistaken: If the gentleman from New York is better informed I would be glad to have him enlighten me.

Mr. WOOD. There is an indirect trade by English bottoms; but there is no direct trade between the city of New York and Constantinople.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, that is evading the question. If the goods of the gentleman's constituents go in English bottoms they need protection just as much as if they went in American bottoms. The point I make is that the interests of this country in the country governed by the Sultan are infinitely larger than those which it has with Rome.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not the Government of Turkey that excludes American vessels from the Black Sea and the Dardanelles until they have paid tribute and humbled themselves?

Mr. JUDD. And all other vessels. The requirement is not applicable to American vessels especially.

Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose the gentleman from New York has made his motion in earnest, but that he simply desired an opportunity to make an issue with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE.] He has charged this side of the House with opposing the amendment because of some religious or political fanaticism influencing its action on this question. Why, Mr. Chairman, the Pope has never reciprocated our civility by sending a minister to this country. It has always been a one-sided affair. More than that, ever since Italy became substantially consolidated under Victor Emmanuel, this mission to Rome has been a sinecure and, to a certain extent, a thorn in the side of the great nation of Italy, which is upon friendly terms with us. This is a fact that should be taken somewhat into consideration by us; but it is not a controlling consideration. I repeat, however, lest the gentleman from New York or any other gentleman should make a mistake as to the position which I occupy, and which I believe is occupied by a majority of the gentlemen who have voted with me upon this question, that we have thus voted because we believe this mission to Rome utterly useless, simply affording a place in which to deposit some favorite to live at his ease at the public expense.

Mr. WOOD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by adding at the end of the pending paragraph the following:

Provided, That the minister accredited to the Government of Nicaragua shall also be accredited to the Governments of Honduras, Guatemala, San Salvador, and Costa Rica, and shall receive as compensation $9,000 a year, with a secretary of legation, who shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year, and no more.

The minister at New Granada shall also be accredited to the Governments of Venezuela and Ecuador, and shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, with a secretary of legation, who shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year, and no more.

The minister at Uruguay shall also be accredited to the Argentine confederation, and shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year and no more, with a secretary of legation, who shall receive a salary of $1,500 a year, and no more.

The minister at Peru shall also be accredited to the Governments of Chili and Bolivia, and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, with a secretary of legation, who shall receive a salary of $1,000 a year, and no more.

Mr. Chairman, the committee will perceive that this amendment proposes to consolidate the missions in the Central American States, where we now have five missions, and to give the duty to one man. It also proposes to consolidate the mission to Venezuela, New Granada, or the United States of Colombia and Ecuador, where we have three missions, and to give it to one man. It also proposes to consolidate the missions at the Argentine confederation and Uruguay into one. As there is a war between Brazil and Paraguay, in which the Argentine confederation and Uruguay are parties, it is not proposed to consolidate these missions any further. Again, it is proposed to consolidate the missions to Peru, Chili, and Bolivia.

Now, sir, out of the $316,000 which we appropriate for diplomatic salaries $114,000 are spent in these South American missions, and by the consolidation I propose, with the assent, I believe, of a majority of the Committee on Appropriations, although we have had no meeting when the whole committee was present since the matter was up—I say the whole business can be done, and much better done, for $41,000 a year, thereby saving $78,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, the reason why we originally established these missions was this: when any one of these colonies declared its independence of the mother country and established a republican form of government, in order to show our sympathy with them and to give them moral aid and support, we sent them a minister. But, sir, that time is now passed. They are quite as able to stand alone as Spain, their mother country; and, indeed, she is much nearer a republican form of government than they are a monarchical form of government. There is no such amount of business with these small South American republics as will justify us in keeping up a diplomatic force there greater than that which we have in the whole of Europe. It costs $114,000, as I have already said, out of the $316,000 for the whole of our diplomatic force throughout the world. There can be no reason for keeping it up, except for the purpose of giving office to some men who are to be favored; and, if we are to go into any reform or any economy, I think these salaries are more useless and of less consequence to the Government than any other one of its expenditures. And these salaries, you will remember, are all paid in gold with the addition of the difference in exchange.

In one of the missions, where the salary is $10,000, the minister has been absent for six months on leave. If they can get along without a minister from this country for six months I would like to have them try whether they cannot get along without a minister to that country altogether.

Having explained the amendment, which I believe has the sanction of a majority of the committee as a measure of economy and reform, I will wait to hear what may be said in opposition to it before making any further remarks.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to object to the amendment exactly, but to express my surprise that gentlemen on the other side, in their efforts toward economy, should begin at the little end instead of the great one. The same principle would apply to European missions that would apply to these South American missions; and if we are to have a consolidation of the South American missions I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has undertaken this work of reform, that instead of having, as this bill provides, separate missions to the European Powers, he should provide a distinct minister for Great Britain and one at Paris to take charge of our affairs in France, Spain, Belgium and Holland, and another in Russia to take charge of our diplomatic relations with Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Italy. For, sir, the facilities of communication by rail in Europe, and the facilities of concentrating telegraphic messages relating to our foreign intercourse, are greater by tenfold than upon the continent of South America, besides in European States we have established a consular system abundantly able to meet all of our wants, and except so far as our material interests are concerned, we have no connection with the monarchies of Europe or any other part of the world. But we have, or should have, an intimate social connection with the republics of South America, based upon the recognition of the principle of our public international and continental policy known as the Monroe doctrine. There seems to be a manifest objection, therefore, that a Representative from Massachusetts should bring in a system antagonistical to the principle of which Adams has claimed to be the father, and should be blotting out, under the specious or not specious plea of economy, our relations with these republics in South America, while we are keeping up our foreign system at a great expense with the Powers of Europe.

Sir, the facility with which diplomatic relations under the present system of intercourse among nations can be maintained, has been most admirably illustrated in the late mission from China to this Government, and that of Great Britain and France. If the diplomatic relations of the world are to undergo such a revolution as is illustrated by Mr. Burlingame's mission; if a foreign minister of the United States can be converted into a diplomatic traveling agent for two continents, and can be received without umbrage and without difficulty here and in Europe, I hail this effort of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as one in the right direction, provided he will apply it where the economy can be greatest. I must therefore ask of that gentleman, basing his amendment to some extent as he does upon a principle, why he has not carried out this reform in the direction I have hinted at in the amendment which I suggest to him?

Mr. KELSEY. I move as an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. It seems to me this amendment is not germane to the bill as an appropriation bill, inasmuch as it proposes independent legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the point is made too late. But the Chair is of opinion that the amendment is germane.

Mr. KELSEY. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the exact reason why I have not ventured to ask to consolidate the various missions in Europe. It is this: we are now making an appropriation for the year commencing the 1st of July next, and ending the 30th of June, 1870. Within that time I look for very great changes in the face of Europe, wherein we may, and probably shall, need diplomatic representation. I have therefore left untouched by my amendment the various diplomacies in Europe, wishing that we may be represented there in every country where the great changes take place, which I have no doubt will occur, and they may do so at any hour.

But, sir, I do not understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] is quite in earnest. If he is in favor of great economy he certainly will be in favor of small. But one of the most invidious ways of attacking any measure is to ask the question, Why do you not do more? Let us do this. I will vote then to consolidate some of the missions in Europe. And I will here say that I voted against the mission at Rome, and the reason was I thought there might be two or three of these missions substantially useless, which might easily be consolidated or got rid of. But I ask any man to state, which my friend has failed to do, what use we have for these missions in South America? Why cannot the minister at New Granada do all that is required for Venezuela and Ecuador, where there has not been a diplomatic question raised for the last twelve years? The last minister at Ecuador wrote to the Department that it was very difficult to state the reason why he was there at all. Why cannot the minister in Uruguay do all the business for the Argentine confederacy? Why cannot Peru and Chili, which are now allies against Spain, with a little bit of Bolivia intervening between the two countries, be represented by one minister, their interests being the same? And why shall we not begin now to save this amount? I pledge myself to go as far as the furthest with other gentlemen in abolishing what I believe are useless ministers. In all these countries, at every sea-port and every important place we have consuls, consular agents or commercial agents who will see to it that the interests of this country are protected.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I was not in when this amendment was first offered, being called out of the Chamber for a moment, or I should certainly have raised a point of order upon the amendment, on the ground that it changes the existing law. The act of 1856 regulates the whole business of our diplomatic intercourse, and this is a change in the fundamental law regulating our diplomatic affairs. The ruling of the Chair in Committee of the Whole has been different at different times as to the time when the point of order may be made. Sometimes the ruling has been that it should be made at the first introduction of the amendment. Other Chairmen have sustained it at any time before final action. The object of the rule of the House is, that appropriation bills shall be discussed as such, and not in connection with the general legislation of the country. But as the Chair has decided that the amendment is before the committee, I trust it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no Chairman has ever ruled that the point of order can be raised after debate upon the amendment, and the gentleman will remember that in this case two or three speeches were made for and against the amendment before the point of order was raised.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is a difference of recollection between the Chair and myself. Of course, the Chairman states his and I state mine, and it is not necessary to press the point any further. The more recent rulings are, I concede, as the Chairman states. The earlier rulings, according to my recollection, were different. I have always admired the policy of the English Government in her sagacity in extending her influence over the civilized world. There is no place where there is a pound sterling to be gathered up that she has not some one there to represent her interests. That policy is a wise one, and it has helped to make England the great nation that she is. Our policy should be, at least on this continent, to make our influence felt in every part of it, not merely for political reasons, but also for commercial and business reasons. It is important, as I conceive, that for this purpose we should cultivate intimate and kindly relations with these republics of the Latin race, and do everything to prevent that jealousy which difference of origin, difference of religion, difference of climate, is only too apt to produce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A single question. Does the gentleman understand me as proposing that we shall not accredit ministers to any of these Governments? I only propose to accredit a minister to all of them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand the gentleman's proposition. It is to bunch up several governments and treat them as a whole; as a distinguished citizen of his own State once, when a boy, asked his father to say grace over the whole barrel of meat instead of saying it at every meal. I trust that this policy suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts will not be adopted, and that we will hold even more intimate diplomatic relations with these American republics than we have done hitherto, and certainly that we shall not do anything to weaken our influence with them. Generally we have been, as I conceive, little careful of the character of the representatives that we have sent and in the style of our intercourse with the other republics on this continent. I would cultivate with them the kindest, the friendliest, the most intimate relations, as I have said, as well for political reasons as for business and commercial reasons. If there are any investments that we can make as a nation that will pay for the making it seems to me that this is one of them.

Mr. KELSEY. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. CHANLER. I move to strike out the last paragraph of the amendment. I do so for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I have been asked for reasons. Well, there are very many reasons why I think this measure should not be brought before the House at this time. I do not feel called upon to descend into any personal explanation as to why the gentleman from Massachusetts should be destroying the minister to Chili from this Government. It is very evident that our minister to Chili tried to destroy him, but the fact of his stamping the district in Massachusetts which the gentleman has the honor to represent cannot possibly underlie his motives. Such an idea is not to be insinuated or entertained. I do not say that he has brought in here so long and so well prepared an amendment to this bill for the sole purpose of "feeding fat his ancient grudge." It was in the search for some nobler motive, one more worthy of a Representative amending a bill before this House, that I asked for an explanation why, on the plea of economy, a member of the Committee on Appropriations should seek to do away with a whole set of missions to republics and leave untouched the costly missions to the monarchies of Europe. Why, sir, these missions in South America are and have been, and most likely will be, filled by brigadiers as bold as he.

You must see, Mr. Chairman, that there is a "coigne of vantage," an unfair advantage, which the brigadier who is elected to Congress has over the brigadier who tries to defeat him for Congress, or over that brigadier who, having fought and bled and, perhaps, lost one or more of his limbs, receives no pension and no recognition from this ungrateful Republic other than a foreign mission, and who, after being stripped of his salary as an officer of the Army, after being reduced to the ranks of civil life, is sent abroad to some place on the Atlantic or Pacific coast of South America, there to heal his wounds and preserve his honor. And shall we, under the plea of economy, strip from one of the few brigadiers left the privilege of sporting his uniform in the presence of foreigners? I believe a proposition has been brought forward for the express purpose of enabling General Grant to decorate the heroes of this country in some way equal to the elaborate decorations which the Governments of the Old World bestow upon their heroes.

Now, I warn gentlemen that if this amendment shall prevail it will deprive the families of very many brigadiers of their only means of support. This seems to me to be an act of ingratitude, somewhat an act of personal revenge, probably an act of economy, but at the best a very doubtful one. You will still have these brigadiers upon your hands; the party organization must take care of them; and if a brigadier leaves his position on the coast of South America, receiving his traveling expenses from the committee in charge of the canvass in behalf of General Grant—if he is not to be provided for, where is the gratitude of this Republic? I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to withdraw his amendment. What I have suggested has been brought forward upon the impulse of the moment. I do not believe the gentleman entertains any grudge against the minister to Chili, but such may be insinuated.

Mr. BROOKS. I concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and hope his amendment or the substance of it will be adopted. I should prefer a division of the various propositions he has submitted; but in the main it is an economical, a wise, and a sound amendment.

It is intimated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that in this matter we might imitate the example of Great Britain. Now, what has Great Britain done in Central America, in the states of Guatemala, San Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, neither of them with one half of the population of either of the three wards of the city of New York which I represent? Great Britain accredits to all Central America only one man to act as consul-general, while we send there five ministers. Guatemala and San Salvador are represented in this country by but one minister plenipotentiary, who resides not in Washington, but in the city of New York. Guatemala has half a representative, not here but in New York; San Salvador has half a representative, not here but in New York; Honduras has half a representative; Nicaragua has half a representative; while Costa Rica is represented only by a chargé d'affaires. Yet here in this bill, following a bad precedent and a bad example, it is proposed to continue our five ministers to Central America when one is all that Great Britain has there and one is more than sufficient to transact all the business of this country there, and better qualified than would be five persons who had the business divided among them with no one to have the business there generally in charge, which might be the case should all the duties of our five ministers there be concentrated in the hands of one person.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is not the gentleman aware that these officers while absent always have some one upon the spot to represent them and to act in their name?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not propose to do away with the consuls at any of these places. Duplicate, triplicate the consulates, if necessary, in the various ports of Central America, but let us do away with the expense of ministers plenipotentiary.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman propose to endow the consuls with diplomatic functions?

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, no. What I propose, or rather what is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose amendment I am advocating, is to have one minister for all Central America, with consuls in the various states composing it. It has been explained that the large number of representatives we have had in Central America arose from the recognition of those states when they first became independent of Spain. I think such is not exactly the fact, but that these numerous positions were created for the purpose of giving offices to certain individuals at a period preceding the administration of the Republican party, though that party has followed the bad precedent thus established. I hope that this proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts with regard to Central America will be adopted.

One word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD.] There are in this bill propositions for missions to Bolivia, Ecuador, and Paraguay, neither of which has any representative here in the city of Washington. One of the objections of the gentleman from Illinois to a representation of our country at Rome was that Rome has no minister at this capital. Whatever excellence there may be in that argument, whatever weight it may have had in the mind of the honorable gentleman who urged it, I demand that he shall, as a consistent man, carry out that line of argument and move to strike out the provision for ministers to Bolivia, Ecuador, and Paraguay. And the gentleman cannot evade the force of this proposition by saying that we have no interests to be cared for in the city of Rome. Sir, we have greater and higher interests in Rome than in almost any commercial country in the world. Rome is the seat of the arts, the place where students of art from every part of the world must resort for the cultivation of their taste by the study of the works of the great masters.

The sculptor must resort there, the architect must resort there, the painter must resort there to study the works of Raphael and others. Unless our artists resort to Rome to perfect themselves in their profession there can be no advancement in this country in any but the coarser branches of industry and art. Why, sir, the State of Connecticut makes the best clocks in the world—clocks which should take the lead in the markets of the world; but those clocks are rarely if ever seen in the parlors or saloons of the rich, because of the incapacity of the manufacturers to make for them cases attractive in design and such as their value as timekeepers demands. Artists educated in Rome, in the midst of the best models, would be able to design such cases for those clocks as would give them a leading place in the markets of the world and cause them to adorn the saloons of Paris as well as those of London and New York.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose that after my colleague [Mr. JUDD] shall be heard, debate on this amendment shall, by the consent of the committee, be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN?]

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, there may be a question of consistency with reference to my action upon the various portions of this bill; but that will depend upon our progress in the further examination of the various sections. But, sir, I can see a broad distinction between the young nations of Central and South America, infantile as they comparatively are, struggling as it were for existence, with material resources limited and bound round in every direction. I say that I can see a very marked difference between that class of governments not being represented here and governments of immense extent of territory and almost unbounded resources.

The gentleman from New York has told us that Rome is the seat of learning and of art. Let us concede that, and also that our pleasure-seekers and students visit that ancient capital of the world in pursuit of their profession. But, sir, in conceding this I do not concede that the protection and safety of our citizens depend at all upon the fact that our representative at that court should be a minister resident, instead of a consul. No American citizen who goes there, either in pursuit of pleasure or study, needs any higher protection than can be afforded to him by a United States consul.

But I do not subscribe to the gentleman's doctrine that there are no other places which students of art visit except the city of Rome. Our students of art and literature visit other capitals in Europe in pursuit of their profession; and I will say that we have in our own borders men who are entitled as artists to rank with the foremost in Rome or anywhere else. For, sir, the progress of art in this country—and no one knows it better than the gentleman from New York—has kept equal pace with our progress in our material interests. Our artists have reputation abroad to-day, and that reputation will continue to increase; and students of art who go to study at Rome need no further protection than can be afforded to them by our consuls. I am, therefore, opposed to the continuance of the mission to Rome, as I am to all other useless offices.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At St. Petersburg, Madrid, Berlin, Florence, Vienna, and Mexico, $1,800 each.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move after the word "Vienna" to insert "Rio de Janeiro." My reason for it is that this bill provides for dropping, or at least does not provide for paying, for a secretary of legation at that court. Now, sir, in the empire of Brazil, with a population of some twelve million inhabitants, where the business of the legation far exceeds that of the one at Berlin at least, and some other places on the continent where secretaries of legation are allowed, this officer is needed. I speak not unadvisedly when I say that it would be impossible for the representative of this Government at Brazil to go on without some aid of this character.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the Department of State is in favor of this proposition, and I do not know that I shall object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I notice that the bill in another place refers to the republic of Mexico. There was a time when that phraseology was necessary in order to show that we recognized Mexico as a republic, but that is now past, and we might as well say the empire of Brazil or the kingdom of Denmark as the republic of Mexico. I move to strike out the words "the republic of."

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to insert, at the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, under the heading of "consulates," after line ninety-three on page 5, the words "and a consul at Valencia, Spain, at an annual salary of $1,500." He informed me that this was agreed to by the committee but was left out by a mistake of the printer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand that the committee agreed to any such amendment, and I do not see the necessity for any such consul.

Mr. KELSEY. I spoke on the authority of the gentleman from Ohio.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. KELSEY, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-nine; noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am willing to let the amendment be considered as adopted, and we can have a vote on it in the House.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois whether in this long list of consulates any new names have been introduced? I see some here which I do not recognize as having been in former bills; I notice the place of Bahia; but the gentleman can say whether any new names have been introduced or not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Not one new name has been inserted.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read the following item:

For expenses under the act of Congress to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and her Britannic majesty for the suppression of the African slave trade, $12,500.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he can make something of a saving by striking out this item of $12,500. We are relieved from all responsibility now as regards slavery and the slave trade. The treaty to which this article refers, which I have before me, was made for the special purpose of relieving our country from the charge of being connected with the slave trade in order to supply the southern States with slaves. No slave is now found on our soil. Therefore we are no longer under any responsibility of guarding the coast of Africa, and it is quite time, it seems to me, that we should relieve ourselves of any connection with slavery and the slave trade by refusing to appropriate this item, as is here proposed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the Committee on Appropriations were not unmindful of the suggestion he has just made. But they found this appropriation to be required by the treaty, which is the highest law. We are bound to carry out its provisions, and hence we put this appropriation in the bill. At the same time the member from New York [Mr. KELSEY] drew up a resolution, which is to be offered as soon as this bill is disposed of, directing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to inquire into the expediency of abrogating or modifying the treaty.

Mr. BROOKS. In that case I suggest, as this session is a short one and in all probability we shall scarcely reach his bill, that we now insert this additional paragraph:

That the Secretary of State be directed to inform the Government of Great Britain that the United States no longer wish to continue in operation article nine of the treaty with Great Britain of August 9, 1842.

What is the objection to that?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am not prepared to do that unless I know more about the treaty or the necessity of having it continued in force. While the Committee on Appropriations were very desirous of saving this amount if possible, still they did not wish to act in the dark and undertake to legislate here without full knowledge of matters which necessarily belong to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Whether or not the treaty should be entirely abrogated or modified it is certainly not the sentiment of the American people to neglect to do anything which is to put a complete end to this blot on our nation's history.

Mr. BROOKS. I will waive the amendment and allow the appropriation to go for this year, but I give notice that I will move to strike it out next year.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am opposed to striking out this appropriation, because even with the abolition of slavery in the United States there yet remains the duty to be performed before the world in pursuance of our own fixed public sentiment on this subject in reference to the slave trade, in no way touched, in no way brought into such condition that we are relieved from the obligation by the fact that slavery no longer exists here. That treaty simply provides, as by agreement between nations, that the slave trade shall be held to be piracy, and for the purpose of enforcing the mutual obligations of that treaty mutual agreement is made that the ships of each nation may be overhauled for the purpose of ascertaining the character of the vessel, whether a slaver or not.

Now, I am sorry to be compelled to confess, that within my own personal knowledge, upon the coast of Brazil, long after the slave trade had been held to be piracy by that Government, as well as ours and that of Great Britain, cargoes were actually landed by two New York merchants and carried up into the mountains; and I am still more sorry to add that while one of those captains of slavers was thus engaged his mother, a very excellent woman, was delivering anti-slavery lectures in New York. But what is true no longer perhaps in reference to the coast of Brazil, is probably true even at this time in reference to Cuba and some other parts of the world, and I do not feel like ridding ourselves of all responsibility for its existence by refusing to take our part in the police of the sea in order to prevent this form of piracy from being continued any longer. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is no amendment pending.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no diplomatic or consular officer shall receive salary for the time during which he may be absent from his post (by leave or otherwise) beyond the term of sixty days in any one year: Provided, That the time equal to that actually occupied in transmitting mail matter to and from their respective posts to Washington may be allowed in addition to said sixty days, and section three of act of March 30, 1863, is hereby repealed.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise rather to suggest than to make a point of order, and I do it in order to avoid the precedent. I submit that this is legislation on an appropriation bill, and that the Committee on Appropriations had no right to report such a provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, as this seems to be a limitation upon an appropriation made, and that is in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not appeal from the decision of the Chair, because I do not wish to consume the time of the House. I do not disapprove of this item of the bill, but I should be very sorry to see a right thing put in the wrong place. I think the provision is right, but this is a very wrong place to put it in.

The Clerk then read the third section, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the fee provided by law for the verification of invoices by consular officers shall, when paid, be held to be a full payment for furnishing blank forms of declaration to be signed by the shipper, and for making, signing, and sealing the certificate of the consular officer thereto; and any consular officer who, under pretense of charging for blank forms, advice, or clerical services in the preparation of such declaration or certificate, shall charge or receive any fee greater in amount than that provided by law for the verification of invoices, or who shall demand or receive for any official service, or who shall allow any clerk or subordinate to receive for any such service any fee or reward other than the fee provided by law for such service, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be dismissed from office, and on conviction before any court of the United States having jurisdiction of like offenses be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $2,000. And hereafter no consul, vice-consul, or consular agent in the Dominion of Canada shall be allowed tonnage fees for any services, actual or constructive, rendered any vessel owned and registered in the United States that may touch at a Canadian port.

Mr. BROOKS. I raise a question of order on that section, because it creates a misdemeanor in the fourteenth line and prescribes a punishment of fine and imprisonment. It is new legislation in an appropriation bill, and it is not in the power of the House to take the yeas and nays on this section. It is a most dangerous mode of legislation, and I feel it my duty to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, because this is clearly new legislation, creating an offense and providing for the punishment of it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will state that this provision was introduced into the bill at the instance of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who can explain it. It may not be in the right place, but it is certainly a very proper thing to be done, and unless it is done in this bill it will not be done at all.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me suggest to the gentleman that when the bill goes into the House he can offer this section there by general consent, and we can then do the right thing in the right way.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand very well that if the gentleman insists on the point of order the section must be stricken out.

Mr. BROOKS. I must insist on it, because it is important legislation, on which the yeas and nays cannot be called.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the section will be stricken out.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized, in his discretion, to cause examinations to be made into the accounts of the consular officers of the United States, and into all matters connected with the business of their said offices, and to that end he may appoint such agent or agents as may be necessary for that purpose; and any agent, when so appointed, under the seal of the Treasury Department, shall, for the purpose of making such examinations, have authority to administer oaths and take testimony, and shall have access to all the books and papers of all consular offices. And any agent appointed in this behalf shall be paid for his services a just and reasonable compensation, not exceeding five dollars per day for the time necessarily employed, in addition to his actual necessary expenses, the same to be paid out of the fund appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue, but no greater sum than $5,000 shall be expended as compensation of such agent or agents in any one year. And the said Secretary of the Treasury shall communicate to Congress, at the commencement of every December session, the names of the agents so appointed, and the amount paid to each, together with the reports of such agents.

Mr. SCHENCK. I raise the point of order on that section, and I will accompany it, if the chairman of the committee will permit me, with a suggestion. Here are three or four sections clearly of general legislation, and yet they contain, I think, some very wholesome matter. They might, perhaps, properly have come from the Committee on Commerce; but by whatever committee reported, I think they are entitled to the consideration of the House in some form, this section being one of them. I suggest that they be withdrawn from this bill and be introduced as a separate bill, or else, if they are thought important, that an endeavor be made to get them put in the bill in the Senate, where they have no such rule as we have in regard to matters not germane to the bill; and if they come back from the Senate attached to the bill we can no longer take exception to them. I make this suggestion because the sections are clearly out of order as general legislation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Ohio will suspend the point of order for a moment I desire to make a statement. The third section remains in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the third section is out.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understood that only a portion of it was objected to.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the whole of it was objected to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Of course I was fully aware that a point of order could be taken on all the sections, and that they could be excluded from the bill by the objection of any one member; but the provisions of these sections were deemed so important to the public Treasury that the Committee on Appropriations directed them to be reported in this bill; for, whatever we may say in regard to this matter, it is very certain that unless the sections go into this bill they will never become a law. They are cognate to this subject of consuls, and there is no objection except a technical one to their being put in.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has objected to the third section, which is in regard to the verification of invoices and consular fees. It is a matter in which the constituents of that gentleman are more particularly interested, perhaps, than the constituents of any other member upon this floor. It has been ascertained that these consuls abroad, who receive good and sufficient salaries by law for all their services, have been in the habit of charging illegal, unofficial, and unauthorized fees. It is a disgrace to the officers and to the Government. All that we propose here to do is to prevent that being done, and to fix a punishment should it be done. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] still insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BROOKS. I must; and that shows how disinterested I am, if, as the gentleman says, my constituents are so interested in this matter. But I cannot consent to create a new crime and to fix the penalty for it in this manner.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that is the gentleman's objection to the section, I am entirely willing it should be amended in that respect as he may think proper; I am not particular about the penalties.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman can accomplish his purpose in a proper manner under the rules.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has appealed to me to withdraw my objection to this fourth section. I would do so except that the third section has already been ruled out, and I think there are other sections of this bill that are not properly before this committee under the rules of the House. Now, I am astonished that the gentleman from Illinois, who is the chairman of the Committee on Rules, should be so strenuous to have us abandon all our rules upon this subject, because, although we may make some wholesome improvements here, it may result in much trouble to us hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that all this debate is out of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am of that opinion myself; but as I was permitted to go on I thought I would make some remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would rule that section four of this bill is in order, because it is a mere regulation in reference to the expenses of the Government for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I shall make no objection to anything in this bill.

Mr. WOOD. As the Chair has overruled the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I desire to say that the provision of this section, which gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to appoint agents to go all over the world to inquire into these accounts, is giving him a power which we should not delegate to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overlooked the fact that this section authorizes the creation of new offices. The Chair is of opinion that that is not in order, and therefore rules this section out of order.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That any consular officer of the United States who shall neglect to render true and just quarterly accounts and returns of the business of his office and of the moneys received by him for the use of the United States, or who shall neglect to pay over any balance of such moneys which may be due to the United States at the expiration of any quarter, before the expiration of the next succeeding quarter, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement of the public moneys, and shall, on conviction thereof, before any court of the United States having jurisdiction of like offenses, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year and by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and shall be forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit in the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. I raise the point of order that this section embraces independent legislation, and therefore is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no consul general or consul now holding, or who shall hereafter hold either of said offices, shall be permitted to hold the office of consul general or consul at any other consulate, or to exercise the duties thereof; and hereafter there shall only be allowed to any vice consulate or consular agency for expenses thereof an amount sufficient to pay for stationery and postage on official letters.

No amendment was offered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I offer the following additional section, which has had the informal assent of the Committee on Appropriations, and if adopted will save at least a thousand dollars. It is recommended by the Secretary of State. It is as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the entire expenses of prison and prison keepers at the consulate of Bangkok, Siam, shall hereafter not exceed the sum of $1,000; and the salary of the interpreter shall not exceed the sum of $500; and no salary shall hereafter be allowed the marshal at that consulate; and the salary of said consul at Bangkok shall hereafter be $3,000.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALLISON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1870, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As there are some matters which the committee want to look over I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till next Monday, immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. BROOKS. Why does the gentleman propose that the bill be postponed?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. For the reason that the committee want to make some further examinations, and perhaps offer some further amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas the slave trade has been practically suppressed; and whereas by our treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the slave trade large appropriations are annually required to carry out the provisions thereof: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of taking proper steps to secure the abrogation or modification of the treaty with Great Britain for the suppression of the slave trade.

Mr. ARNELL. I object.

E. B. BIDWELL AND SARAH HACKLEMAN.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas private act No. 262, granting an increased pension to Emily B. Bidwell and to Sarah Hackleman, approved July 27, 1863, is so framed that in the judgment of the Commissioner of Pensions it cannot be executed: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of reporting a bill which shall grant the relief contemplated by the said act.

GOVERNMENT SALES OF GOLD.

Mr. MORRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, be and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House a statement showing the aggregate amount of gold coin sold by the Government since January 1, 1863, in each year, with the date and amount of each sale, the rate and amount of premium realized, the commissions and expenses attending the same, and to whom paid, and stating particularly to what account such expenses and commissions were charged, and to what account the premiums were credited.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the request contained in its resolution of the 15th ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State, communicating information in regard to the action of the mixed commission for the adjustment of claims by citizens of the United States against the Government of Venezuela; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the Lake Shore Grape Growers' Association, praying the enactment of a law to grant letters-patent on new horticultural varieties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, representing that that Territory is producing a very large amount of gold, which is rapidly increasing; that their circulating medium there consists chiefly of gold dust; that they are subjected to great inconvenience and loss in sending their gold dust to San Francisco to have it assayed or converted into coin; and they pray that the bill establishing an assay office in Idaho as it passed the House of Representatives may pass the Senate. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of the Lake Shore Grape Growers' Association, praying the enactment of a law to grant letters-patent on new horticultural varieties; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DAVIS. I present the petition of John J. Rogers and others, who entered some public lands that had been previously appropriated for the State of Illinois for canal purposes, and had been specially appropriated by the canal company. The petitioners of course lost their lands by the prior right of the canal company, and they now ask that the purchase money which they paid for the lands be reimbursed to them by special act of Congress. I move that the petition and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the memorial of J. H. C. Coffin, professor of mathematics in the United States Navy, praying that his pay may be made equal to that of a captain in the Navy on shore duty; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I also present the memorial of James Pratt and a large number of others, clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal church, urgently petitioning Congress to take immediate action for the passage of a law forbidding, under heavy penalties, the carrying of petroleum or other inflammable oil in any public conveyance by land or water where passengers are to be transported at the same time. A private letter from one of the memorialists to me states that two of the agents of that religious denomination have lost their lives in consequence of petroleum being carried on board of vessels. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I also present the remonstrance of Joseph Lanman, rear admiral, and several captains, commanders, lieutenants, &c., in the Navy, earnestly remonstrating against the passage of a bill now pending to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy, and giving their reasons, not at great length, but succinctly. I should like, before this memorial is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom it should go, to have it read for the information of the Senate, and more particularly as the bill is now pending in the other House, with a view to have the contents understood. If there is no objection I should like to have it read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read if there be no objection. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES NAVAL STATION,
PORTSMOUTH, N. H., December 25, 1868.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, line officers of the United States Navy, respectfully beg leave to represent to your honorable body that we have seen the proposed bill to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy; that we also understand it to be asserted by the surgeons that this bill has the approval and support of "all the sensible line officers;" but that on the contrary, in our opinion, the measure is altogether objectionable and opposed to the best interests of the service.

To any one familiar with the history of previous and similar attempts on the part of the staff officers of the Navy it cannot be surprising to find these gentlemen once more advancing their exaggerated pretensions and demanding an inordinate rank for their own personal aggrandizement, apparently either ignorant or regardless of the injury done to the service generally. But hitherto, although the various general orders and enactments procured by them on this subject have not met with our approval, it has not seemed necessary to us that our opinion should be formally expressed; and had it not been claimed to be the exact reverse of what it is, in the present instance we should probably have remained silent, as heretofore. We simply cannot allow the assertion to pass current by any default of our own.

With regard to the merely personal aspect of the question, the persistent encroachments of the staff corps have always proceeded upon the assumption that rank is of supreme importance to them, but have wholly ignored the fact that the line have an equal interest in the decision, inasmuch as the value of any distinction is necessarily lessened by every addition to the number of those who enjoy it.

But we object to the proposed bill upon much higher grounds than these, namely, because it will seriously impair the discipline, the efficiency, and the harmony of the Navy; it creates an additional expense at a time when the energies of all should be directed to an opposite result; it gives positive instead of assimilated rank, (which alone should ever be conceded,) and does this in a degree which is absurdly out of all proportion to their duties or to the requirements of the service. It is an insidious effort to exempt a department from the legitimate and necessary authority and control of the line, and it aims at an invasion of the cabin by a crowd of staff officers, which ought never to be permitted.

We thereupon pray that your honorable body will not pass the proposed or any similar bill without first satisfying yourselves that we are mistaken in the amount of support given to it by line officers, and also that the bill itself is better entitled to that support than we believe it to be.

JOSEPH LANMAN,
Rear Admiral United States Navy,
And other naval officers.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CORBETT. I am requested to present the memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, asking Congress to extend a branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Salt Lake by way of Snake and Boise valleys, in Idaho Territory, Powder river, and Grande Ronde valleys, and so on, to Portland in Oregon, on the Willamette, and from thence to Puget sound, Washington Territory, setting forth the importance of such a road to the community and the advantages to the Government. I move its reference to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE presented a memorial of distillers and liquor dealers of California, remonstrating against the increase of the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of miners and agents of miners on the Pacific slope, asking for the passage of an act relative to duties on the importation of carbonate ores; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLE. I also present the petition of numerous influential citizens of Santa Barbara county, in California, asking for the establishment of a southern district court of the United States in that State. They set forth that they suffer great inconvenience by being compelled to take a long sea voyage to reach San Francisco, where the present court is held. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of William T. Eustis, asking the passage of an act for the settlement of the depreciation of the currency of the soldiers and officers of the Rhode Island brigade, their heirs and assigns, as the same were made to them and ascertained by a committee appointed by the Legislature of Rhode Island at the February session thereof in the year 1784, the report whereof was received by the Legislature at their October session in 1785, in accordance with the principles and promises made to the Army of the Revolution by the resolve of the Continental Congress of April 10, 1780, and of the further resolve of August 12, 1780, and subsequently embodied in an ordinance of the same Continental Congress of 7th of May, 1787.

This subject has been before Congress for a long time. It has been reported upon favorably repeatedly, and I believe a bill for relief has passed one or both branches of Congress several times, but has never become a law. It relates to a most interesting chapter of revolutionary history very creditable to the patriotism of New England, and not very creditable to the justice of the Federal Government. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of shipbuilders and shipowners of the United States, protesting against the passage of the bill providing for an increased duty on copper, and proposing a substitute therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOLDING OF DOUBLE OFFICES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the bill which I reported yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary, respecting the holding of two offices at the same time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S.

No. 691) to prevent the holding of civil offices by military officers, and to prevent the holding of more than one office at the same time, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That no person shall hold or shall be receive salary or compensation for performing the duties of more than one office or place of trust or profit under the Constitution or laws of the United States at the same time, whether such office or place be civil, military, or naval; and any person holding any such office or place, or who shall accept or hold any other office or place of trust or profit under the Constitution or laws of the United States, shall be deemed to have vacated the office or place which he held at the time of such acceptance.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I should be pleased to hear from the Senator from Vermont or other members of the Committee on the Judiciary, who reported this bill, some explanation of the precise scope of the bill and what is its purpose. The law as it now stands, I believe, is the same as is embodied in this bill so far as relates to the compensation of officers who are holding one office and may be designated for another; that is to say, no man can now receive pay for performing the duties of two offices. This bill, as I understand it, prevents the designation of any person either permanently or temporarily—for I think it includes ad interim appointments—to perform the duties of a civil office who may, at the time he may thus be appointed, hold a military or naval office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will with great pleasure give such explanation as I am able of this proposition. In the first place, my friend from Iowa is mistaken in supposing that the present law as to compensation is merely reenacted in this bill. The law now does permit, at least it does not prohibit, paying the same person the salaries of two offices where those salaries are below a certain sum—$2,500 per annum. The committee thought it eminently proper that that should be corrected.

Then, as to its including temporary designations, what are commonly called ad interim appointments, the committee endeavored to frame the substitute which is reported so as to clearly exclude from the operation of the bill that class of persons, so as not to prohibit the President of the United States or any head of a Department in whom the law should repose the authority to make ad interim appointments from selecting any other officer whatever to perform temporarily the duties of the office to which he might be called, as we did not think such mere temporary employment, as distinguished from an appointment, was obnoxious to the grave objections in principle and in practice that relate to complete investiture into two offices by the same person. Ad interim appointments, as they are called, are not an investiture of the person thus called to temporary employment into the office the duties of which he is performing, but they are the mere designation of one officer or person to perform the duties of and belonging to some other office that is vacant; and it is only because the office is and continues to be vacant that the President of the United States, within the meaning of what I am now speaking of, would have any authority to permit any other person to exercise the functions of that office, because the appointment to an office must be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and we all know that these ad interim appointments, as they are called in common parlance, are reposed by law in the sole power and discretion of the President.

We therefore declare in this substitute, so as not to interfere with the statutes upon that subject, and differing probably or possibly from the construction that might have been put upon the original bill, "that no person shall hold, nor shall he receive salary or compensation for performing the duties of more than one office or place of trust under the Constitution or laws of the United States at the same time." That in law plainly means, upon all principles of construction that I am acquainted with, that the same person shall not have the title and become invested in the possession of two offices at the same time. So I do not think it open to that objection.

Now, as to the principle upon which the bill proceeds, the main principle to which my friend alludes, I am sure, if he has given any attention to them, the considerations upon which such a measure is proposed cannot have escaped the intelligence of my friend's mind. It appears to us, and I think most intelligent and reflecting men will agree, that it is contrary to the essential principles of a free government certainly that the same citizen should hold and possess two public employments at the same time, irrespective for the moment of the question whether those employments are necessarily inconsistent with each other, because the theory of government goes upon the principle, and it is a true one, that every office which is created is created because it is necessary that the duties of that office should be performed in the administration of law for the public good; and therefore, inasmuch as in contemplation of law all the offices that do exist require the attendance and the attention of the person who is to fill them and execute them, if he chooses to take up some other office or employment, is called by his Government to the fulfillment of some other public administration, he must either leave the administration of the office that he did hold vacant and unadministered, or he must give place to be supplied by some other citizen or officer who shall succeed to him in the administration of it. And so clear is this principle, that in the constitutions of many States, my own among the number, there is an enumeration of all the chief offices in the State, executive, judicial, civil, administrative, with the declaration that no citizen shall hold more than one of those enumerated offices at the same time.

Now, to go a step further, look at the dangers—now, they are merely theoretic, of course; I would not wish anybody to suppose that the committee believe that any person, so far as we know, who may be holding two offices is obnoxious to the suspicion of thereby causing any danger to the Republic; but we pass laws of general effect for all time and upon general principles—look at the dangers in this point of view of the consolidation of many offices in the possession of one person; look at the dangers of the consolidation of civil offices in the hands of military officers in times of great excitement and of breaches of the law, where the military officer is bound to obey the orders of his superior under the articles of war, if you please, and under the principles of military law, let them be almost what they may, and where the civil officer, as in almost all our statutes there is power given to him, is empowered to call upon the military officer for aid to enforce his functions. Suppose the marshal of the United States for the district of Vermont is also a colonel in the Army at the same time, and there is stationed in the State of Vermont a regiment of troops. The marshal takes it into his head, with a warrant that he has obtained from some commissioner, to arrest a citizen in violation of law, for instance, and the citizen says, "I have a right to resist illegal process, and I do; I decline to be arrested, Mr. Marshal." The marshal, acting then as colonel, commands his lieutenant colonel to march up the infantry and take him.

It does not need any illustrations, as it appears to me, to show the danger of it. It is the consolidation of military and civil power in the same hands when the spirit of the Government and the spirit of the Constitution, and I do not know but its letter, declares that one shall be subject to and in subordination to the other. There cannot be that subjection and subordination where you place the military power and the civil power in the hands of the same man. In order to control military operations by the civil power as far as it was possible, the Constitution contains a provision, as you know, sir, that the highest civil officer in the United States, the President, by virtue of his office and not by virtue of being an officer in the Army, shall command the military power as Commander-in-Chief.

These are mere illustrations, but they illustrate, as it appears to me, forcibly and conclusively the theoretic and intrinsic impropriety in a Government of laws and in a Government of liberty of consolidating or permitting the consolidation of separate functions of government in the hands of any one man, whoever he may be. I am happy to repeat, sir, that I know at this moment of no individual instance where there is the practical danger to which I have referred as one that is possible in all Governments, and, as we study history, one that we know is not only possible, but real in the South American republics.

These are briefly an outline of the principles upon which the bill proceeds.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that this bill does not reach some cases that have occurred, and that ought to be affected by this legislation. The reason for prohibiting a man from holding two offices under the United States does not apply with the same force as where he holds an office under a State government and under the national Government, because the laws of the State may conflict with the laws of the national Government. I happen to know of a case where an officer holding a very high and valuable office under the laws of a State—an office which would require every moment of his time—is now an officer of the United States, receiving a large salary, discharging both offices, receiving the pay of both offices, and under an extraordinary decision, as I think, of the Internal Revenue Bureau, is also authorized to receive his moieties as an informer. It seems to me that that is a case which ought to be affected by this legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I entirely agree, personally, with my friend from Ohio, and I shall certainly make no objection to an amendment which will cover that case. In my own State we have a constitutional provision which absolutely prohibits a State officer from accepting, without giving up his State office, an office under the General Government.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a similar provision in nearly all the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a case that has actually occurred in Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there are any such cases they ought to be reached, in my judgment. I cannot speak for the committee, however.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What case is that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The recorder of the city of Cincinnati, in Hamilton county—an office of great profit—is now one of the supervisors of internal revenue under the recent law. He holds both offices, and by a decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue he is also entitled to the fees of an informer; but that I have no doubt can be corrected by a change of the law. I propose, therefore, as an amendment, if this will reach it, "nor shall any person holding an office of trust or profit under the laws of a State receive any salary as an officer under the laws of the United States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Make it go further, that no officer holding an office under the United States shall hold any office under a State.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose you draw it up in your own language.

Mr. CONNESS. The constitution of nearly every State, I think, contains a provision against the occurrence of the difficulty pointed out to exist in Ohio by the Senator from that State. The constitution of California provides that no citizen of that State shall hold any office under the State who holds an office under the Federal Government where the compensation exceeds $500 a year. That enables postmasters holding inconsiderable places, where their salary does not exceed $500, to perform the functions of State offices in some cases, and it is found to be a public convenience. A provision of the kind now suggested would unsettle a great many of those trivial cases. It is the duty of the State to take care of this point, as I think, and not leave it to be taken care of or protected by congressional law. If there is an officer, as described by the Senator from Ohio, in that State, holding a lucrative office under the State, now appointed to a correspondingly lucrative place by the Secretary of the Treasury, it is simply a piece of maladministration on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon his attention being called to it he should promptly correct it.

Mr. SHERMAN. In justice to the Secretary, I will say that the Secretary did not probably suppose, at the time of the appointment, that the officer would continue to hold on to his office under the State. It is carried on by deputy.

Mr. CONNESS. There can be no difficulty about that, because the Secretary can ascertain in twenty-four hours whether the officer intends to hold the two offices or not, and he should be promptly removed if he should continue to hold the two offices. But, I repeat, if a provision of this kind is adopted it will unsettle a great many very trivial cases, but cases of importance to those persons; and it appears to me that the remedy should come from the other side, namely, from the action of the States and not from a congressional law. There can be no difficulty about correcting the case to which the Senator from Ohio alludes, and all or nearly all the Senators sitting about me have replied that in their States there are provisions against such an occurrence.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to state to the Senate that a similar case has occurred in my State, where the United States marshal, who is holding that office, a very lucrative one, has been elected sheriff of a county, another lucrative office, probably paying $10,000 a year. It was supposed when he was elected that he would resign the office of United States marshal, but he has not done so, and still holds both offices. It seems to me there should be some provision in this bill to reach such cases. I merely mention this for the information of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I do not know but that the general principle that this bill aims at may be well enough to a certain extent, but it strikes me the language is so very general that it would be likely to cover a great many cases which the Committee on the Judiciary did not intend, or would not, on reflection, intend to include in the provisions of the bill. Now it says "any office or place of trust or profit." What do they mean by "place?"

Mr. SHERMAN. "Under the Constitution or laws of the United States."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, "under the Constitution and laws of the United States." Take, for instance, a case which has been familiar. It has been customary, for instance, to appoint the collector of customs in certain places superintendent of light-houses, and to give him a small sum in payment for his services in that particular.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He does not have a separate commission, does he?

Mr. FESSENDEN. He is appointed under the law, I suppose, and I presume has a separate commission. If the Senator from Vermont means, and if the committee mean nothing except two separate, distinct commissions emanating from the Government applying to particular offices, let the bill say so, and let us have the matter so that we understand it, and so that it will not cover cases that the committee do not intend to cover. Now, for instance, we are protected well enough. There is no office hardly in the gift of the Government that is not made by nomination to the Senate and confirmation. If you mean such offices as those say so, but do not leave the language so general that it applies to every little appointment that may possibly be made by way rather of a designation of duty than anything else, and for which some payment may be received and ought to be received. It is a matter of great convenience, and undoubtedly designations of that kind are very frequently made for the reason that the officers are known to the several Departments and their ability and their integrity are known and understood.

Now, sir, with reference to this matter you can take familiar instances if you please. I wish to speak, however, more particularly of the matter of holding State offices. The constitution of Maine provides that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of the Legislature, except postmasters. They allow postmasters to be members of the Legislature if I remember the provision rightly. What objection is there to that? The Senator from Ohio says it will not do for a man to hold a State office if he holds an office under the United States. Suppose a postmaster receives a salary, if you please, of $1,000, or less, or more, and the people in the town where he resides choose to elect him as a member of the Legislature, is there anything objectionable in that? Do you wish to prohibit it in any way? Perhaps such a case as is spoken of by the honorable Senator from Ohio is one that ought to be prohibited for another reason, and that is, that one man cannot attend to the duties of the two offices.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Officers of militia are also excepted in my State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that they are in mine. And so, with reference to the case spoken of by the Senator from Oregon, a man evidently should not be a United States marshal and at the same time sheriff of a county. He cannot attend to the duties of the two offices except by deputy in each case. There may be cases where the prohibition would be a good one; but there may be other cases where it would be a very unreasonable one, and would only make difficulty. The language is any "office or place of trust or profit." I have a familiar illustration in my mind now. Take the case of retired officers of the Army; many of them retired on very small pay, not enough to support them; disabled officers, retired on account of being disabled; and they return home and live in the place where they were born and bred, and their fellow-citizens choose to elect them to some petty office or other. Is there any objection to it? I intimated that I had an illustration, not of an office of profit but a place of trust. I know an officer in my own State and in my own town who is a retired officer of the regular Army, a disabled officer. The people of the city chose to elect him an alderman. He receives no pay whatever. If the people of a man's native city chose to elect him under such circumstances as an alderman, or selectman, as we call it, of the town, he cannot under this provision accept the office and serve them unless he gives up his retired pay and vacates the position which he holds under the United States. Is there anything unreasonable about that, or any danger of allowing it in such a case as that or in a thousand similar cases?

Now, sir, although I confess I do not see the necessity of the prohibition, I have no very great objection to it if it be properly limited and expressed so that it will not do a great deal more harm than good. There are no officers of the United States of any particular consequence that I know of who do not come before the Senate for confirmation. We have, therefore, the whole matter in our own hands, and we can control it at any time. Take any case that you may suppose: take the case of a distinguished officer in the Army or Navy, for instance, who is nominated for minister abroad. We know very well that he would not give up his place in the Army or Navy for the sake of accepting a post which he can only hold until perhaps a change of administration, or for a very short time. We know, however, that as the law stands, if he does accept that post for the time being he cannot receive the pay of the other office. That he might be willing to do. If the name of an officer of the Army or Navy is sent here for a very important position we understand perfectly well what the question is, and we can reject him if we see fit; we have entire power over it. But if Senators think that with reference to this class of officers it is necessary or advisable to go further and prohibit the holding of both, I do not know, as I said before, that I have any very great objection.

So with reference to the matter of national and State offices, I entirely agree with the honorable Senator from California that that should be left to the State itself. If the State chooses to appoint an officer of the United States or a man holding an office under the United States to a civil office in the State, or if the people of the State choose to elect a man under those circumstances to a civil office in the State, what objection can there be to it on our part? If he accepts that office, and if by the acceptance of that office he has not the time or the ability to discharge properly the duties of the office which he holds under the United States, the power is in the hands of the United States Government at once to remove him, he having elected to hold an office under the government of his State. If the State thinks it will not be injured, there is every reason, then, why the State should set the matter right. It should look out for its own interest. It is not for us, as I suppose, to meddle with it, unless we are satisfied that the holding of such a place is not consistent with the parties holding a place under this Government, when he can be removed, and undoubtedly would be in a proper case.

If any harm has been done heretofore, if any injury has followed, it would be a cause for interfering with the matter by law; but I am not aware that there has been any such injury. The cases suggested by the honorable Senators are such as could easily be remedied at any moment in one of two ways: either the officer can be removed as a United States officer or the State can regulate its own laws; and if it does not choose to make the necessary regulations I do not see why we should interfere with them at all.

But, sir, the principal object for which I rose was to request my friend from Vermont to make the matter more definite, and to go only so far as he really intends to go. At present I think the bill would do a great deal of harm. I wish it to be well understood how far the matter is to be carried. As to the danger to liberty from it, we have been in existence as a nation for a great many years and I do not know that we have ever suffered anything in this way. I have heard no complaints on the part of the people on that score; and I do not think that, with the number of applicants there are for every office of consequence in the gift of the United States Government or of the people of a State, any considerable number of persons will be suffered to hold two important offices. That, if not contrary to the spirit of our institutions, is contrary to the spirit of a very large portion of our people, enough, I think, to control the matter, so as not to have any very essential injury follow from it.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

MISS SUE MURPHY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphy, of Decatur, Alabama. That bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and upon it the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the earnestness and vigor with which this claim is pressed upon our consideration by its advocates indicate to my mind a necessity that it should be resisted with equal earnestness and equal vigor; for it is not to be denied, as I have once before remarked, that the bill involves a very important principle of public law as well as a vast amount of money which may be claimed against the Government of this country by persons setting up to be loyalists at the South whose property may have been taken and used or destroyed in the course of the war.

The compliment which the honorable Senator from Kentucky in his gallantry—for he is always gallant—has paid to the present claimant may be very well founded. He says she is a very fair claimant. I hope that is the case; I shall not dare dispute that proposition of the honorable Senator. She may be very fair; she may be very unfortunate; she may have been, and perhaps is, still a great sufferer in consequence of the damage done to her property under the orders of General Sherman. But it will not follow, because she is fair or unfortunate or a great sufferer that she therefore is entitled to the money she asks in the bill. That is a question of law, of public law, and we are now acting upon it.

We are now about to settle a precedent either the one way or the other which will be followed in the future. If we pass this bill upon the state of facts on which it is introduced there can be no reason why we should not proceed in the future to make similar allowances to every person in the recently insurrectionary States who shall make out for himself a case of loyalty and whose property may have been taken and used or destroyed in the regular operations of our armies during the rebellion. Whether it be the duty of the Government to respond by way of indemnity in all such cases is the great question now before the Senate; and its importance cannot be concealed. The danger to the finances of the country to arise from an allowance of such a claim cannot be concealed. It becomes more and more evident the more you contemplate it, the more you examine it.

Now, sir, as I remarked the other day, discuss this matter as you will, talk of it as you please, you come back ultimately to this original question: what is the extent of protection which is due from a Government to its citizens in time of war? That question embraces all the other questions which in their nature are questions of law. I do not propose, Mr. President, to read from Vattel or from Grotius or any of the other great writers upon public law; I merely wish to call the attention of Senators to some precedents, one particularly existing in our own history which certainly will not be unfamiliar to the Senators from Vermont and New York.

It is a historical fact that originally Vermont belonged to the colony of New York. Toward the close of the last century the people of Vermont declared their independence of New York and set up independence for themselves. They succeeded by force of arms in establishing and maintaining it. The government of New York, long years previously to the conclusion of that contest, had issued a number of patents for lands lying within the present limits of Vermont, and after the settlement of peace and the substantial recognition of the independence of Vermont by New York the patentees under the latter government made application to the State of New York for indemnity for losses sustained by them as the results of the insurrectionary violence, as they called it, of the Vermonters. They appealed to New York for indemnity for the loss of their lands, their titles, and their personal property; and the question came distinctly and fairly before the Legislature of that State whether it was the duty of New York thus to indemnify its loyal citizens who had been residents of Vermont; and what was the result? Chancellor Kent, in narrating these events, tells us:

"The claimants were heard at the bar of the House of Assembly by counsel in 1787, and it was contended on their behalf that the State was bound, upon the principles of the social compact, to protect and defend the rights and property of all its members"—

The exact doctrine which is now urged upon us here by the honorable Senator from Kentucky and other Senators—

"and that whenever it became necessary, upon grounds of public expediency and policy, to withdraw the protection of government from the property of any of its citizens without actually making the utmost efforts to reclaim the jurisdiction of the country, the State was bound to make compensation for the loss. In answer to this argument it was stated that the independence of Vermont was an act of force beyond the power of this State to control, and equivalent to a conquest of that territory, and the State had not the competent ability to recover by force of arms their sovereignty over it, and it would have been folly and ruin to have attempted it. All pacific means had been tried without success; and as the State was compelled to yield to a case of necessity, it had discharged its duty; and it was not required, upon any of the doctrines of public law or principles of political or moral obligation to indemnify the sufferers. The cases in which compensation had been made for losses consequent upon revolutions in government were peculiar and gratuitous, and rested entirely on benevolence, and were given from motives of policy or as a reward for extraordinary acts of loyalty and exertion. No government can be supposed to be able, consistently with the welfare of the whole community, and it is therefore not required, to assume the burden of losses produced by conquest or the violent dismemberment of the State. It would be incompatible with the fundamental principles of the social compact. This was the doctrine which prevailed; and when the act of July 14, 1789, was passed, authorizing commissioners to declare the consent of the State to the independence of Vermont it was expressly declared that the act was not to be construed to give any person claiming lands in Vermont, under title from this State any right to any compensation whatsoever from New York."—1 Kent's Commentaries, pp. 173, 179.

Mr. RICE. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Michigan a question. Did the State of New York get the benefit of any of that property?

Mr. HOWARD. She was paid for it in the first instance.

Mr. RICE. Did the State of New York get the property?

Mr. HOWARD. The State of New York got the purchase price, for she patented the lands to the claimants, and of course they could not obtain their titles without paying for them; so that New York did get the benefit of every foot of land she sold in Vermont.

Mr. President, the revolutionary war, from which followed the disruption of this country from the mother country, drove out from among our forefathers a large number of persons known as loyalists. Many of them took refuge in the British provinces, more still in England; and at the close of the war, having been driven out of the country sometimes by means of tar and feathers, sometimes by military force, many of them made reclamation upon the English Government for indemnification for their losses. They were loyalists who adhered firmly to their king. I do not say that there was any merit in that, but such was the fact. They had been deprived of their property as one of the results of the war of the revolution. Some five thousand of them made application to Parliament for the passage of an act granting them indemnity. Of course it is impossible for me now to state with any particularity the nature of their several claims. It is sufficient to say that they established the fact that in consequence of their loyalty to the British crown they were deprived of their property and subjected to heavy pecuniary losses; and nobody can doubt it. In the discussion of the bill in Parliament Mr. Pitt, the minister, in speaking of the claims of these loyalists, used this language:

"He laid it down that however strong might be the claims of either of the several classes into which they were divided neither should regard the relief to be extended as due on principles of right and strict justice."

He denied that there was any principle of right or strict justice attaching to the Government of Great Britain which required it to indemnify the British loyalists who had thus been stripped of their property; but as an act of benevolence Parliament in the end granted to them about fifteen and a half million dollars by way of relief.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator, with his permission, whether that opinion was expressed upon a case where the property had been taken by the British commander for the purposes of his campaigns?

Mr. HOWARD. It was expressed generally on the bill then before Parliament.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if it was not a case of general indemnity because of losses incident to the war?

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly; I said so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And not a case of a specific loss occasioned by an appropriation of property on the part of some one that represented the authority of the Government?

Mr. HOWARD. Of course, I am not able to say upon what precise point or what particular fact the remark was based; but the remark applied generally to the bill then before the House.

Now, sir, the case before us must be decided upon its own facts. We have heard much from the honorable Senator from Kentucky and the honorable Senator from West Virginia respecting the lawfulness and justice of this claim. We have been told in very emphatic language that no right-minded man can vote against this bill; that the bill can be resisted upon no recognized principles of public law or public justice; and we are almost branded as robbers for rising in our seats here to resist it. The language, however, is a mere matter of taste; I shall not quarrel with that; I go to the principle of the bill itself.

Now, what were the facts of this case, Mr. President? I wish the Senate and country to understand them distinctly, in order that it may be known upon what facts this claim is based; and now I take the liberty of reading a report made upon this identical claim by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] then a member of the Committee on Claims, on the 9th of July, 1866. This report says:

"This is a claim for compensation for a dwelling house, out-houses, stable, carriage-house, &c., the property of the petitioner, situated in Decatur, Alabama, and taken for military purposes under the following order."

Now follows the order of the general in command; and I ask the Senate to mark its date, March 19, 1864:

[Special Order No. 72.]

HEADQUARTERS
ATHENS, ALABAMA, March 19, 1864.

The necessities of the Army require the use of every building in Decatur for Government purposes. It is therefore ordered—

1. That all citizens living in Decatur, or within one mile of the limits of the town, on the south side of the Tennessee river, shall move outside of the lines within six days from the receipt of this order.

2. They will be allowed to go North or South, as they may deem best, and take with them all their personal and movable property.

3. As fast as the buildings are vacated the commandant of the post will take possession of them, and see that they are preserved and no damage done them.

4. No exceptions to this order will be made except in the case of the families of persons in the Army or employes of the Government.

5. Brigadier General J. D. Stephenson will cause this order to be immediately complied with.

By order of Brigadier General G. W. Dodge:
J. W. BARNES,
Assistant Adjutant General.

The report then proceeds:
"General Sherman had previously issued an order to fortify Decatur for a military post."

The committee omit to state what was the date of General Sherman's order directing Decatur to be fortified, but it must, of course, have been previous to the 19th March, 1864, and during the flagrancy of the war. The war was still raging with all its horror and destructiveness in Alabama, as well as in other portions of the confederacy. It had by no means been brought to a close. There was just as much necessity in Alabama at that time for military operations as there had been at any previous time, and so General Sherman understood it, and in view of the public danger issued this order for fortifying Decatur. The report proceeds:

"In the erection and construction of fortifications under these orders it became necessary to remove the buildings and fences belonging to the estate of Miss Murphey in the construction of Fort No. 1, and all the improvements on the property were either destroyed or applied to military purposes."

It was an act of war during the flagrancy of war in the enemy's territory, before the enemy had become subdued, and in every sense in which it can be viewed was as much an act of military necessity, of war, as the movement of General Grant against Richmond.

Mr. HOWE. Will the honorable Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him what facts there were which constituted Decatur enemy's territory on the 19th of March, 1864?

Mr. HOWARD. I will. I was coming to that. The honorable Senator puts to me the question what facts constituted Decatur enemy's territory in March, 1864. I will tell him. First, the whole of Alabama was included in the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln of 1861, as being in a state of insurrection; and in his proclamation of 1862, declaring the same thing; and, if I mistake not, his proclamation of 1863 reasserted the fact that the State of Alabama was in a condition of insurrection. That is the first fact that constituted it enemy's territory. The second fact is this: that the contest in which we were engaged was not a mere local, irregular, loose insurrection or mob; it was a war, having its military lines as distinctly marked as those that ever distinguished the lines of war between foreign nations. The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized it as a war, having those divisional, jurisdictional lines, and the State of Alabama fell within the enemy's territory. All the rebel States were by our own Supreme Court, after solemn argument, adjudged to be enemy's territory, and the persons residing within them and the property within them to be enemies and enemy property. It arose from the very necessity of the case.

It was impossible for us to conduct that great contest on the one side or the other without recognizing the laws of war in all their amplitude on each side. Foreign nations so recognized it. England and France and the other Powers of the earth granted to the rebels the rights of belligerents, by declaring themselves to be neutral as between the contending parties. The whole world and our own Government in all its acts recognized that territory as being enemy territory in respect to us, treating it as every hostile territory is treated in the prosecution of a war.

Now, sir, if there was war there at that time, if it was enemy territory, if Miss Sue Murphey was a resident of that territory, then, by the well-established rules and usages of war as recognized by the same Supreme Court, she was an enemy and her property was enemy property, liable to be taken and used in the prosecution of the war without any right at all to indemnity.

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky says it was peace then in Alabama, especially round about Decatur; that there was no war there; that the Federal Army had got possession of a small patch of country, including Decatur, and therefore there was no war at Decatur; and inasmuch as there was no war at Decatur, ergo, according to his reasoning, that clause of the Constitution became applicable which declares that private property shall not be taken for public use except upon just compensation. Well, sir, the only question is, was it a time of war and a condition of war at Decatur where this property was seized, or was it peace? If it was peace, and this property was taken in a time of peace and not under circumstances necessarily involving the fact of the existence of war, then I concede that the Constitution in the clause to which he refers would require us to indemnify the owner; but, unfortunately for the Senator's argument, such was not the fact.

The Constitution not only declares that private property shall not be taken for public use except upon due and just compensation, but also that the Government of our country may wage and carry on war; and if it may wage and carry on war it may do all those acts which are necessary and usual for the accomplishment of the end and object of the war. If my house is in the way of the march of the Army, my house must be removed, and the commander who gives the order for the removal is only acting in the line of his duty as a military man.

There is no relation at all between the case supposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky and the actual facts of this case. If we may prosecute war in hostile territory, we may seize and remove buildings for that purpose without incurring an obligation to compensate the owner.

The argument of the honorable Senator, it seems to me, is a very peculiar one. If I understand him rightly, the current of his reasoning is this: that wherever the Union Army went and established itself during this contest there was peace and not war, because on the appearance of that Army, according to him, peace supervened and the obligation of that clause of the Constitution to which he refers resumed its force. Well, sir, if that be correct doctrine, then it follows that no Union officer had a right to seize a single particle, even of rebel property, wherever he went, for the Federal troops being in possession of the soil, peace was ipso facto established, and a Federal officer could not be permitted under the Constitution to seize a house or a horse or an ox, or to forage upon the hostile inhabitants at all, but would be bound to pay the owner, whether loyalist or rebel, for all damage he might happen to do him, and for all supplies he might take from him.

I do not understand, Mr. President, how a war can be waged in that way. It seems to be a very strange description of war, such a one as is not described in any of the books. It is not a war the object of which is to do any person any harm or to injure the property of the enemy. Indeed, it recognizes nobody as an enemy and no property as enemy property. It turns the whole object into a mere boyish sport. It is no war, but, in the cant language of the day, a "slight unpleasantness" for the moment. I regard it very differently, sir. I concur entirely with the rulings of the Supreme Court as to the true character of that contest; and I hold with them that it was a duty of humanity on both sides, a duty the performance of which was indispensable, to recognize and to enforce all the usages and laws of war.

It is unnecessary for me to say that it is one of the laws of war that whatever may be the feelings of a resident of the hostile territory, although he may happen to belong to the invading party, if he has property in that territory it is treated as enemy property, liable to be seized and used by the conquerors at their own will and pleasure; and such is simply the condition of Miss Murphey, whose case is now before us.

Now, sir, I have said all I desired to say upon this bill; but I would again earnestly call the attention of the Senate to the principle upon which it rests. If we pay this unfortunate lady what she claims we shall be compelled in the end to indemnify all persons claiming to be loyalists at the South whose property has been taken by our military officers during their operations in the field, and it will not be long before the rebels themselves will bring forward similar claims against the Government; and we shall have gentlemen upon this floor claiming that inasmuch as it was no war, as it was not the right of a State to secede, they ought to be compensated for their losses, also. Why, sir, you would have more claim agencies at the South than ever existed on the face of the earth. They would be thicker than the frogs of Egypt. The agents would be among you and around you and upon you in all forms. It will be next to impossible to legislate in this body comfortably and intelligently if we invite this multiplication of claim agents and shysters, who would find fat pickings out of these claims. I hope, sir, the Senate will take care not to expose the country to such a calamity.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rose to move an executive session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to giving way for that purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RACHEL W. HUSTON.

Mr. KOONTZ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1594) granting a pension to Rachel W. Huston; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FRANKLIN OLIVER.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1595) to perfect the title of Franklin Oliver, a soldier in the war of 1812, to certain lands which he claims to have covered by military warrants; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

STATIONERY FOR INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ELA. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to investigate the stationery contract of the Interior Department, and what articles have been furnished as stationery, and the manner in which stationery supplies have been furnished, and whether any articles have been procured in violation of law, and if so to what amount, and by whose order, and whether any have been paid for and not furnished; and that the Secretary be directed to suspend all further payments for stationery until further action by the House.

If the House will permit me to make a statement, occupying not more than ten minutes, there will be, I think, no objection to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA.] asks unanimous consent to make a statement, occupying ten minutes, before the Chair asks for objections to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. CHANLER. Will there be an opportunity for reply?

Mr. ELA. I shall have no objection to a reply.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will understand the House as consenting that the gentleman from New Hampshire shall have ten minutes, and that the same time be allowed for reply.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes are allowed to the gentleman from New Hampshire, and ten minutes in opposition to the resolution, when the Chair will ask whether or not there is objection to the resolution.

Mr. ELA. Mr. Speaker, I will state briefly the object I have in view in offering that resolution this morning. In the Department of the Interior there have been contracts and purchases in the space of thirteen months to the amount of $18,000, made in direct violation of law, because the law provides that all printing, binding, and blank books ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives, or by executive or judicial departments, shall be ordered to be done at the Public Printing Office. I hold in my hand a sample of books which have been purchased by that Department at a cost of twenty-five dollars each. It is a simple index book of twelve sheets of foolscap paper, with a printed index alphabet. I am also informed that the Department has purchased one hundred and forty thousand tag cards at forty dollars a thousand, of which one hundred thousand cannot be accounted for. A large number of patent heads, such as the one I exhibit, has been furnished at fourteen dollars a thousand which are now furnished at twenty-five dollars a thousand.

There is also pending before that Department an account, which this resolution proposes to defeat, with an order of the Secretary of the Interior to pay it, for three hundred thousand sheets of bond paper at eight cents a sheet. I have before me the sworn statement of the acting Commissioner of Patents, made last July, that he had never made any such contract while he was acting as Commissioner. I have also his further statement, as follows:

"While acting as Commissioner I have bought and paid for three hundred and fifty thousand sheets of bond paper, and I have never ordered or received any other paper."

Now, I understand that a committee appointed for the purpose of investigating into the contracts for supplying the Patent Office with stationery has come to the conclusion that that bond paper ought to be paid for, when the acting Commissioner declares under oath that he had never ordered it or contracted for it. Upon that report the Commissioner of Patents has been ordered to pay for that paper. The object of my resolution is to stop the payment for those three hundred thousand sheets of bond paper until a full investigation can be instituted into all of these matters. In the investigation before the Committee on Printing last July it was ascertained that this bond paper could be bought for thirty cents a pound or one cent and one third a sheet. We are now asked to pay $24,000 for paper that can be purchased for $3,000.

Mr. WELKER. What committee does the gentleman refer to as having investigated into the stationery contracts of the Patent Office?

Mr. ELA. A committee of the Interior Department.

Mr. WELKER. Not a committee of this House?

Mr. ELA. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New Hampshire has stated what was paid for the book which he has exhibited to the House. I would like to know what that book would absolutely cost?

Mr. ELA. It might possibly cost twenty cents. It contains twelve sheets of inferior foolscap paper, ruled simply, and only with an alphabet printed as an index, and twenty-five dollars each have been paid for them.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. What committee did the gentleman refer to?

Mr. ELA. I desire the matter referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. What committee did the gentleman refer to as having reported in favor of these purchases?

Mr. ELA. A committee in the Interior Department.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Appointed by whom?

Mr. ELA. By the Secretary of the Interior. The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes are allowed for opposition to the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the resolution?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not. I wish to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire who made the purchase?

Mr. ELA. The resolution directs the committee to inquire into the purchase.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. And by whose order the contract was made?

Mr. ELA. That is not put in.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is what I want in—by whose order.

Mr. ELA. I will modify the resolution accordingly.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the regular order for the morning hour, being the bill (H. R. No. 1497) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the medical department of the Navy, pending at the expiration of the morning hour of yesterday, on which Mr. STEVENS was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. ARCHER.]

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and the other gentlemen who oppose this bill misapprehend the intention of the Naval Committee and the object of the bill. Its object is to do away with the difficulties which exist between the line and the staff officers of the Navy. That difficulty arises principally from the fact that the staff officers hold their rank by order of the Secretary of the Navy, while the line officers hold theirs by law. This bill therefore proposes to establish by law the standing for the staff. The committee were careful to investigate the relative cost under the new bill and the cost under the present bill, and they have found that the additional cost by this bill would be only one or two thousand dollars. The difficulty now existing will all be settled by the passage of this bill. The staff will then hold their rank by law instead of by order of the Secretary of the Navy, who can change it at any time by his mere volition.

Now, although the nominal rank of these officers is changed by this bill, yet they really occupy the same position, or almost the same. The cost will be no greater than it was before, and they are entitled to have their rank and position established in the Navy. I hope that all opposition to the bill will be withdrawn, and that these officers will be allowed to have their proper rank established by law, instead of holding it, as they now do, by so uncertain a tenure.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to yield to me five or ten minutes.

Mr. ELA. I will yield five minutes.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I am desirous of doing anything in reason which shall add to the comfort or honor of the members of our Navy. Hence I have carefully examined this bill, but my mind is brought to the conclusion that we ought not at this time to pass it, and I must confess I am somewhat surprised to see such a bill offered by so intelligent a Committee as that on Naval Affairs. My respected friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. ARCHER] says this is only intended to settle in a legal way the relative rank of the staff and the line of the Navy; that the additional expense is wholly immaterial, hardly worth our consideration.

Now, I have examined into the relative rates of pay for the line officers and the surgeons of the Navy, and I can show the House in a few words the difference. In the first place, it is proposed to have a chief of this medical staff, whose compensation is not set down, but he is to regulate the whole machinery.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me a moment I will say to him, in all candor, that it is not money that these gentlemen desire. I therefore make this proposition to him: that he may offer an amendment to strike out all increased pay and emoluments, and I certainly shall not oppose its adoption. I do this at the suggestion of some of these gentlemen that it is not money that they are after.

Mr. SPALDING. I shall be very glad to see that amendment adopted by the House. It will save us at least $25,000, and probably nearer $50,000. The bill then resolves itself into this: that our friends, the surgeons in the Navy, are not content with the old-fashioned title of doctor, and they want to be called commodores, captains, and lieutenant commanders. Now, I recollect it is not very long since one branch of the service attached to the Navy, the Marine corps, came forward here and demanded for their commander, who had the rank of colonel, the rank of a brigadier general of the Army. I resisted it at that time because I knew that he would not be content with the rank—that the pay and endowments would follow; and they have followed. And now, before we shall be one week older, there will be a proposition before this House to set back that officer to his old rank of colonel, which is a rank high enough for the Marine corps of our Navy. I would, therefore, object to this bill because these individuals ask for its passage simply from emotions of pure vanity, to be called "commodores" and "captains" and "lieutenant commanders," rather than "surgeons" or "doctors."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I shall offer an amendment, to make this bill more palatable, that if these gentlemen take this stipulated rank in the Navy they shall do it without the increase of one penny to their ordinary pay. That must be stipulated before I can think of voting for the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will allow that amendment to be offered.

Mr. SPALDING. I would rather move to lay the bill on the table, and I will do it and call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] to say that he will offer the amendment, or does he decline to do it?

Mr. SPALDING. I shall move to lay the bill on the table at the proper time.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. The remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and those so elaborately prepared and presented yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] show how little gentlemen understand this bill. The gentleman from Illinois asked that the bill might be sent to the Committee of the Whole that he might have an opportunity to read it, telling the House that he had not read it; yet he was prepared to produce in manuscript, which took him thirty minutes to read, an argument against the provisions of the bill that he did not understand by his own confession, and which by his own confession he had not read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman certainly could not have understood me to say that I had not read the bill. I said no such thing. On the contrary, I said that I had read it in the hope that I could support it.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that he had not read it and had not seen it, and had had no opportunity of doing so.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I stated directly the contrary.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well. This bill adds not $2,000, not $1,700 to the expenses of the Government for the Navy by way of promotion. It is a bill necessary for the maintenance of our naval service. As I said yesterday to the gentleman from Illinois, there are now fifty-five vacancies in this small corps, and you cannot get fit men to fill them. The gentleman from Illinois said yesterday that we had a Navy in 1812 and other wars and no such complaints had been made. We have since then had the war of the rebellion, during which we advanced line officers four ranks, and did not advance the medical staff a degree, and in that way we have made the senior officers of this branch of the naval service the companions of men younger and lower in rank than they were before the war. We have changed the whole social position of the medical staff. This bill proposes merely to readjust it. It does not propose to add emoluments. It is not a measure to gratify the vanity of the medical corps. It is a measure made necessary by the tributes we have paid to those who carried on our naval war. I wish time would permit me to speak at greater length, but understanding that my colleague on the naval committee desires to call the previous question I yield that he may do so.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question on the substitute and on the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the bill and the substitute on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 53, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Buckland, Burr, Roderick R. So the bill and substitute were laid on the table.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 738) to relieve from disabilities John G. Stokes, a citizen of Alabama; when the Speaker signed the same.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 16th ultimo, stating that no deduction can be made in the force or salary of the employés in that Department except by a general reorganization; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S EMPLOYÉS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Attorney General, in answer to a House resolution of the 16th ultimo, stating that no deduction can be made in the force of employés in his department, nor any reduction in their salaries; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GOLLADAY asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the claim of Golladay & Bowling, and the claim of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, at Bowling Green, Kentucky.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order, during the morning hour, is the call of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for reports.

FREE PORTS AT MATAMORAS, ETC.

Mr. BANKS. I present a letter from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of June 9, 1868, calling for information concerning the establishment of free ports at Matamoras and other points on the Rio Grande, together with dispatches received from E. L. Plumb, esq., late United States chargé d'affaires in Mexico, with a copy of recent instructions issued from the State Department to Hon. Mr. Rosecranz, now minister plenipotentiary to Mexico. I move that these papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DIFFERENTIAL DUTIES, ETC.

Mr. BANKS presented a communication from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution offered by Mr. LYNCH calling for information in regard to the differential duties established by the Spanish Government concerning the commerce of the United States with the Spanish West India Islands; and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

J. SOMES SMITH.

Mr. BANKS also presented a letter from the Secretary of State, dated December 15, 1868, recommending the payment of the sum of $1,500 to Mr. J. Somes Smith, commercial agent of the United States at the city of San Domingo, for having concluded, under the instruction of the State Department, a treaty of commerce with the Dominican republic, which has been ratified and proclaimed as the law of the land; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN MATHEW LOWE.

Mr. BANKS also presented a letter from the Secretary of State, inclosing a communication from the United States consul at Nassau, New Providence, in reference to the claim of Captain Mathew Lowe; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JULES ALDIGÉ.

Mr. BANKS also presented a letter from the Secretary of State concerning the claim of Jules Aldigé, and asking that proper measures may be taken to carry into effect the decree of the Supreme Court; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE AND JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. BANKS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers heretofore communicated in answer to calls for information by the House of Representatives relative to the Chinese indemnity fund and the Japanese indemnity fund be printed for the use of the House.

MRS. EMMA WILSON.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 174, for the relief of Mrs. Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Emma Wilson, of Indiana, one quarter of the salary of her deceased husband, James Wilson, esq., as minister to Venezuela.

Mr. BANKS. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 174, being an act for the relief of Mrs. Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana, respectfully report:

That the said bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to pay Mrs. Emma Wilson, of Indiana, widow of Hon. James Wilson, deceased, late minister of the United States to Venezuela, one quarter's salary.

Mr. Wilson died August 8, 1867. It is understood that the practice of the State Department would have justified the payment of the expenses of bringing his family back to this country had they remained there at the time of his death. Mrs. Wilson left Venezuela about one week before her husband's death, and for that reason her case is not within the precedent established by the State Department. She left Venezuela to escape an epidemic prevailing in the country, and which afterward caused the death of her husband. It appeared to the committee, upon a full consideration of the facts, that the widow of the minister not having arrived in this country, her claim ought to be considered substantially the same as if she had remained in Venezuela up to the time of her husband's death; and it is believed, in the view of the facts, it cannot be made a precedent for any substantial departure from the rule already established and voted upon by the State Department in cases of this kind which may hereafter arise. The bill as originally reported to the Senate provided that the salary of the minister for the remainder of the year of his decease should be paid to the widow. It would have given her salary for nine months and twenty-five days, amounting to about six thousand one hundred dollars. This could not be justified, and the bill as it passed the Senate authorizes the payment of the remainder of the quarter's salary, which is about one thousand eight hundred dollars. The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Wilson, our late minister at Venezuela, who was formerly a member of this House, died last year under the circumstances stated in the report of the committee. Had his family remained at the place where he was stationed until his death they would have received, according to the practice of the State Department, the amount of one quarter's salary for the purpose of transporting them to their home. In consequence of the prevalence of the epidemic of the country the wife of the minister left the place where he was stationed about one week before his death. Mr. Wilson was taken ill almost immediately, and died one week after his wife's departure. The committee believe that under the circumstances the case ought to be considered substantially the same as if Mrs. Wilson had remained at the place where her husband was stationed until the time of his death, that event having taken place so soon after her departure. The claim of the family, upon personal and private considerations, is very strong; and I believe it was the unanimous judgment of the committee that this bill should be passed. It is believed that under the circumstances no precedent can arise which would be disadvantageous to the country.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMAINS OF HON. W. T. COGGESHALL.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 967) to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, to the United States.

The bill, which was read, proposes to authorize the Secretary of State to provide for removing to the United States the body of Hon. William T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, and that of his daughter, and to defray the expense of such removal a sum not exceeding $1,000 is appropriated.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the reading of the report which accompanies the bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House bill No. 967, to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, and also the remains of his deceased daughter, submit the following report:

William T. Coggeshall was appointed minister resident at the republic of Ecuador by the Government of the United States on the 4th of May, 1866, and as soon thereafter as he could reach the republic to which he was sent entered upon the discharge of his duties as such minister. Upon leaving this country to enter upon the discharge of his duties he took with him his daughter, a young lady of about fifteen years of age, of fine development of character and intellectual culture, and who, during the period of service of Mr. Coggeshall at Ecuador, acted as secretary and interpreter for him.

Your committee file herewith, and adopt it as a part of this report, a letter addressed to the chairman of this committee by Hon. SAMUEL SHELLABARGER, of Ohio, in relation to the services and death of Mr. Coggeshall and his daughter. Mr. Coggeshall died at or in the vicinity of Quito, in Ecuador, on the 24 day of August, 1867, having acted as minister about fifteen months. It appears also by the letter of Mr. SHELLABARGER, as also from a letter from Mrs. Coggeshall, widow of the late William T. Coggeshall, that his daughter, who accompanied him to Ecuador, died at Guayaquil on the 10th of January, 1868, with yellow fever, on her way home. The body of Mr. Coggeshall, after his death, was buried at Quito, but your committee are informed that it has since been disinterred and is now in a public warehouse. The daughter is buried at Guayaquil, on the coast. The widow and family of the deceased are entirely unable to raise the means necessary to have the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall and daughter brought to this country. Is it not the duty of this Government to do so? The committee think it is. The committee are informed by the Department of State that it will probably require about one thousand dollars to secure the removal of the remains of Mr. Coggeshall and his daughter to this country. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, making an appropriation of that sum for that purpose.

Letter of Hon. Samuel Shellabarger.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO, March 2, 1868.

DEAR GENERAL: William T. Coggeshall, late United States minister at Ecuador, died in that service, near Quito, in August last. He went thither in infirm health and took with him his daughter Jessie, who was an absolutely necessary companion and help for her father. This daughter continued with him up to his death, and really discharged a large part of the business of the legation. This most interesting young lady died of yellow fever on the 10th day of January, 1868, at Guayaquil, on her way home. You will find at the State Department, from E. Lee, our consul at Guayaquil, of the date of January last, a letter giving some of the circumstances of her death. The body of the father (and who rendered especial services in the matter of securing the rights of burial to Protestants at Quito) has since the revolution been disinterred, and is now in a public warehouse. The daughter's grave is at Guayaquil, and liable to desecration at all times. Both bodies ought to be brought home, and unless the Government should do so the family must.

The purpose of the foregoing statement is to say to you that the singularly mournful circumstances of this case, and the very extraordinary expenses attending it, make it a case in which I think you will agree there ought to be a special appropriation to cover these expenses &c. The widow, Mrs. Mary M. Coggeshall, of Columbus, Ohio, and whom please address touching this matter, has proceeded so far in settlement of the estate as to find that his compensation, amounting in all to only about fifteen months, will not pay the actual expenses of the mission; and his widow, with three children, will be left absolutely without means.

I beg you, should you deem it right, to introduce (into an appropriation bill, if that may be under the rules) a bill for the relief of this family. At the State Department you will find many particulars not here given touching this case.

I am, yours, truly,

S. SHELLABARGER.

Hon. N. P. BANKS.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propose an amendment, which I hope the committee will accept, making an appropriation for the relief of the family of Mr. Coggeshall. I desire to move that the sum of $1,000 be appropriated for that purpose; and with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CULLOM,] and of the House, I will briefly state my reasons for making this proposition.

Mr. CULLOM. If the gentleman desires to make a statement I will yield for that purpose, and then say whether I shall yield to have the amendment offered or not.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, if I could make the House comprehend the singularly mournful and distressing circumstances brought to our notice in this bill, then it would agree with me that the small sum of $1,000 I have suggested should be adopted as an amendment.

Mr. Coggeshall went to Ecuador in such a state of health as to make the company of his daughter, fifteen years old, almost a necessity, and, sir, as it afterward turned out, her presence in that country proved to be a matter of great importance to the public service. She really became, although only fifteen years of age, the acting and efficient member of the legation, rendering the Government of the United States, although of an age so tender as that I have indicated, singularly valuable services. Through her instrumentality our citizens procured, what had before been denied, the right of sepulture in favor of Protestants dying there—a right deemed to be of so much importance as to have attracted the attention of the British Government as well as of the public journals of the United States. She watched at his sick bedside until his death, and after his death remained there alone among strangers. When she thought she could do so with safety, she went down to the coast on her way home. She got down to the coast with much difficulty, and when she had reached it she was struck down and died of the yellow fever, which was the prevailing epidemic. The expenses of her father's sickness, and those caused by other unusual circumstances, were far more than the actual compensation of our minister to Ecuador; so that this family have really borne the burdens of that mission, and, although now in distress, will still be left to do so unless the Government shall appropriate for their relief the small sum I have indicated in my amendment. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to my amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which this matter was referred and which reports this bill, felt very much impressed with the peculiar circumstances with which it is surrounded, and while the members of that committee knew the facts stated by the gentleman from Ohio, and were disposed to vote an appropriation for the relief of this family, they thought that the least they could do was to provide for bringing home the remains of this minister of the United States and his daughter. The committee, I think I am safe in saying, have no objection to the amendment if the House shall feel disposed to make the appropriation. I will let the amendment be offered; and I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. I knew Mr. Coggeshall very well. He was one of the most intelligent and patriotic citizens of Ohio. I know that his family have been left in indigent circumstances on account of the sickness and death of this minister, and his daughter, who has been spoken of. Although I wish to economize the public expenditures, still I shall vote for this small appropriation of $1,000 for the relief of this distressed family.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that this is a case which appeals to the sympathy of the House, and it is really unfortunate for gentlemen to be compelled to object to the appropriation of money under circumstances such as have been stated by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois. But, sir, we have many cases of this same character; and it has never, I believe, been the policy of the Government to make appropriations of the public money for merely charitable purposes. We have many instances of families of men who held distinguished positions being left in distress. We have the case of a family of a chief justice of the United States whose children are now dependent upon charity for support—private and not public charity.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. Suppose the gentleman or one of my colleagues here should die, would the gentleman say it would be charity to send the remains home? Is it not, on the contrary, a duty we owe to the remains and memory of a deceased colleague? Therefore, if the gentleman would refuse to pass this bill would he not on the same principle also refuse to vote for sending the remains of a deceased member to his home?

Mr. WOOD. Undoubtedly not, because we have delegated powers in the Congress of the United States, and the money that we vote does not belong to us. If I, as an individual, bequeath or give money it is my own and for my own purposes. But the Government has no power to take the money wrung from the people by taxation and make donations of it for private purposes. It is the principle I object to. If we once commence this kind of legislation there is no stop to it. If we vote a thousand dollars in this case we may be called upon next week to vote a hundred thousand dollars in another case, and so on hundreds of millions for the purpose of bestowing charity upon families of deceased persons. Although I would very willingly unite with these gentlemen, and contribute out of my own pocket a sum to make up a thousand dollars, I shall never vote to give one cent under existing circumstances.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to accept an amendment to his amendment. Instead of saying that we pay $1,000 for the relief of the family, let us say that we pay to the widow of Mr. Coggeshall $1,000 for the services of his daughter to the Government in the mission after the death of her father.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is better.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that the amendment makes an appropriation, and should receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point is made too late, the amendment having been debated.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understood it was offered to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] allowed it to be offered, and it has been debated.

Mr. CULLOM. I will move the previous question, and then yield.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is my amendment pending?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir; it is accepted.

The SPEAKER. Then the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is in time, the amendment being changed.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will not change the amount, only the language of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. A modification would now make it subject to a point of order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I call the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I very much regret that my friend from Illinois did not allow my amendment to be offered. I think if he will listen to me a moment he will see a reason for the amendment which was not fully developed by my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] After the death of Mr. Coggeshall, his daughter, who was serving as his clerk, performed all the duties of the mission, and performed them thoroughly and creditably for three months, until she herself died. She not being an appointee direct of the Government, there was no law for paying her anything for that period of three months' faithful service performed for and accepted by the Government, and not one dollar has ever been paid. The amount proposed to be added by my colleague for this service, $1,000, is a small compensation under all the circumstances of the case. I do not ask, therefore, that we give this sum out of sympathy for the family, but for services rendered by the young lady after her father's death in performing all the duties and discharging all the functions of the office so far as she could do them, and I believe she did all there was to be done. I hope my friend from Illinois will allow the words to be changed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield, with the consent of my colleague I would like to say a word.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I regret to have to oppose these matters continually, but I wish to call the attention of the House to the proposition before it. I know with how much reluctance members are disposed to oppose any of these things, but I ask gentlemen to look at this matter. The original appropriation is entirely exceptional, but I was not disposed to interpose any objection to it. The committee proposed to make an appropriation of $1,000 for the purpose of bringing home the body of the minister and his daughter. That is what I understand it to be.

Mr. CULLOM. That is it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know that we have ever passed a law of this kind. I do not know that the Government has ever undertaken at its own expense to bring back the bodies of its ministers. I do not know that the Government undertakes now to bring back at the public expense the bodies of the soldiers who have fallen in defense of the country. But the Committee on Foreign Affairs have brought in this bill to pay the amount necessary to bring back the bodies of Mr. Coggeshall and his daughter. I was not disposed to interfere with that, but when they come in with an amendment which has not been considered by any committee of the House to give $1,000 additional, I say that I have a right to protest. I do not believe that we have any right or authority to take $1,000 out of the Treasury and give it to this family any more than we have to vote money to the thousands and tens of thousands of families who have suffered by the war and in other ways. That is the objection I have to it; and had I supposed that the amendment was offered for consideration I should have made the point of order at the time it was read, but I supposed that it was read only for information. This amendment has not been considered by a committee. It makes an appropriation, and should go to the Committee of the Whole. And I say, independent of all that, it is an appropriation which we ought not to make on principle.

Mr. GARFIELD. I notice that my friend from Illinois has not, in his remarks, made the least allusion to the statement which I have made and which nobody here will contradict. I desire to state in the outset that the first papers in this case were sent to me, I believe, because my colleague from the Columbus district [Mr. SHELLABARGER] was not here. I was well acquainted with the deceased minister, and I believe I laid the first papers before the committee. The gentleman has not taken the slightest notice of the statement I have made, that for three months this young lady performed all the duties or transacted all the business; kept the books, and did all that a chargé d'affaires would have done under the circumstances.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Where is the evidence of that? Has it been examined by any committee, and has that committee reported the facts, and does that report go on the records of the House as a justification for us to vote this appropriation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know what the committee have to say upon this subject; I should be very glad to hear from them; but I assert as a fact what I have stated, and I have never heard it contradicted. It has been written to me again and again. The mother of this deceased daughter so wrote in her letter. Several prominent citizens of Columbus, Governor Denison among the rest, wrote the same thing also, and I have never heard a contradiction; the gentleman does not himself contradict it. He only makes the point that there is no official report.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want to know it officially before I am called upon to vote this money. If my constituents come and ask me why I voted for this, I want to be able to refer them to the report of a committee. The word of the gentleman would satisfy me, but it might not satisfy my constituents, who do not know him as well as I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust we shall vote this amount.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio. [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. This case seems to present itself involving two propositions. The first comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that is a proposition to pay the expenses attendant upon bringing home the body of the minister and the body of his child. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] with his usual guardianship over the Treasury, for which we all commend him, objects that it is exceptional. I say it is not exceptional. I say that a representative of the Government abroad is as much a civil officer, entitled to its consideration, as would be the gentleman from Illinois if he were called away from us; and every session we perform the lamentable duty of sending home at the public expense the bodies of gentlemen who die, unfortunately for the country, here while in the public service. At some expense we sent home the body of our late lamented President; and if I mistake not, the body of Mr. Cooley was brought home from Peru many years ago under like circumstances, and at the public expense. There is nothing in this precedent which should lead the gentleman to object to the proposition reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Now, what are the facts in regard to the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] and how is it sustained? The proposition is to pay another $1,000 for services rendered by this young lady. I think my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] states the matter too strongly when he says she discharged the duty of the United States minister there.

Mr. GARFIELD. I said the "duties of a chargé d'affaires."

Mr. SCHENCK. I happen to have become acquainted with the fact that after the death of her father this young lady took charge of the public papers and correspondence of the office, and saw that they were properly taken care of, at considerable trouble to herself and delay in the country. That fact being notorious, it is proposed to amend the proposition coming from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which alone is liable to the exception made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] and which objection is not sustained by the constant practice of this House. It is now proposed to amend the bill by adding a proposition to pay this small sum for the services of this young lady. Now, with all my disposition to aid my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] whenever I can consistently do so, in watching the Treasury, I do not feel disposed to put my name upon the record against such a reasonable proposition as this.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has misstated my position. I said I was not disposed to make any objection to the proposition reported from the committee. I was disposed to let that go, but I was entirely opposed to the other proposition.

Mr. BANKS. I do not think the proposition for extra compensation for services rendered by the daughter was before the committee. The committee formed its judgment from the facts attending the death of Mr. Coggeshall. In regard to that matter I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] is mistaken. It is the custom of the State Department when a minister dies abroad to pay the expenses of transporting his body home. In this case the father and daughter died at the same time—

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at the same time.

Mr. BANKS. Very well; they both died abroad. The family did not desire to separate the bodies, and although according to custom the State Department had authority to pay the expenses of transporting the remains of the father to this country, it had no right to pay the expenses of transporting to this country the remains of the daughter. For this reason the family has appealed to Congress for relief. The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommend the passage of this bill, which is to pay for the expense of transporting to this country the remains of the daughter.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] says the Government does not transport home the remains of the soldier. Sir, the gentleman is incorrect in that statement. The body of each soldier who fell in the service of his country has been buried at the expense of the Government. The remains of our fallen soldiers have been transported according to the wishes of their friends and of the Government, and they have been buried upon the places where they fell. And where should a soldier rest if not where he fell in defense of his country? This bill is in exact conformity with the practice of the Government in regard to soldiers. I would not object to the payment for services; but I do not think that subject was brought distinctly before the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Speaker, as I stated in the outset when appealed to to allow the amendment to be offered, the committee determined, notwithstanding the peculiar circumstances surrounding this case, to report in favor of nothing but what seemed to be the absolute duty of the Government in the premises. Mr. Coggeshall was appointed minister on the 4th of May, 1866, and immediately after his appointment departed for Ecuador, taking with him his daughter, who acted as his interpreter and secretary. On the 2d of August, 1867, after serving as minister for about fifteen months, he died. His daughter remained in possession of all the property and papers belonging to the ministry. It has been shown by the papers in the case that she actually had personal charge of the property belonging to the ministry for quite a length of time after the death of her father. On the 10th of January, 1868, about five months after the death of Mr. Coggeshall, his daughter died, about the time she was getting ready to start for her home in the United States. She died at Guayaquil, being in fact on her way from Quito, where the ministry was located, to the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], that the letter of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is made a part of the report of the committee; and that letter distinctly declares that this young lady performed a large part of the duties of the legation.

Mr. CULLOM. So I stated.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Illinois said a moment ago that the fact of the service rendered by Miss Coggeshall did not appear in any report.

Mr. CULLOM. The papers themselves show that this service was rendered. But notwithstanding all these facts the committee, being desirous to give their sanction to no precedent to which the House or the country could possibly object, determined to report nothing but what, according to the report of the Secretary of State, is absolutely necessary to bring home to the United States the bodies of Mr. Coggeshall, our late minister, and his daughter, who acted as his secretary. The committee having information before them that the family of Mr. Coggeshall are in almost destitute circumstances felt very much inclined to report in favor of some appropriation for their benefit. Yet in order to avoid sanctioning any precedent to which the House could possibly object, we concluded to report a mere appropriation of the amount absolutely necessary to pay for bringing home the remains of the father and the daughter.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to inquire whether it is not apparent from the statement filed with the committee by my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER], and from the facts appearing before the committee, that this young girl remained in that country and rendered this service after the decease of her father for a period of at least three months?

Mr. CULLOM. The father died on the 2d of August, 1867; the young girl died on the 10th of January, 1868, just as she was about to leave that country for the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then she remained there performing service for five months. Now, I desire to make a suggestion to the House. My colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER], in naming the amount fixed in his amendment, did not intend to try the patience of the House by asking us to adjust this account according to the strict rule of law and equity between this deceased girl and the Government; for if we were to pay the compensation to which in equity she would have been entitled I venture to say that any just man, upon an inspection of the papers in this case, would declare the amount named by my colleague too small under the regulations of existing law. It does seem to me, under the circumstances, that it would be trifling with all decency and all justice for the House to refuse this pitiful allowance of $1,000 for the five months' service rendered by this young girl without compensation. This amount in the currency in which it will be paid would not have covered her expenses during the time that she remained in Ecuador and took charge of the papers of the Government.

Mr. CULLOM. I recognize fully the merits of this case as presented by the gentleman from Ohio, who knew Mr. Coggeshall. I desire to state in addition that there are other peculiar circumstances surrounding this case which have not yet been mentioned. Immediately upon his arrival in Ecuador as our minister he got into a controversy with that Government as to the right of our Protestant citizens to the rite of sepulture in the burying grounds of the country. He succeeded in securing that right for American citizens dying there—a right previously denied. We owe this to the urgent and earnest efforts of our minister, Mr. Coggeshall. After this a revolution broke out in the country, and our minister's body has been dug up and placed in a public warehouse, where it now is, and this bill proposes to have it brought home. After we have appropriated three quarters of a million for the transportation and burial of the bodies of our soldiers, all of which I approve, I do not think we can consistently refuse to pass this bill for the purpose of bringing home the body of a faithful servant who died in the exercise of his public functions. Without taking up further time I will now ask for a vote.

The question recurred on Mr. SHELLABARGER's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 76, noes 46.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 66, not voting 73; as follows:

During the vote,

Mr. BARNES stated that his colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, was called home by death in his family.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CULLOM demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Moore, his Private Secretary; and also a message notifying the House that he had, on the 22d of December last, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1555) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868; and

An act (H. R. No. 1556) to relieve certain persons of all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the various bills, &c., were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SYMPATHY WITH CRETE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in relation to the resolution of Congress, approved July 20, 1867, declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1869.

Mr. BANKS. I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CHANLER. Is discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. It would be, but the Chair will withdraw it if any gentleman wishes to discuss it, until it is regularly reached by a vote of the House. The Chair asks unanimous consent to lay it before the House, so that the table may be cleared. When the House proceeds to this business regularly it may be debated.

The message, by unanimous consent, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ISSUE OF BONDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement required by act of April 12, 1866, relative to the issuing and avails of bonds; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1596) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. MAYNARD. I reserve the usual objection to any special legislation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think there is any special legislation. There may be some little things.

SAMUEL T. ATKINSON.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to relieve Samuel T. Atkinson, a citizen of South Carolina, of political or legal disabilities.

Mr. MULLINS. I object.

WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of two minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire, in the first place, to have the following preamble and resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 16th December, 1868, referred to the Committee on Appropriations the letter from the Postmaster General, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 7th of December, relative to the contract for carrying the overland mail; and whereas it appears by a communication from P. B. Ball, special agent of the Post Office Department, to Hon. George McClellan, Second Assistant Postmaster General, that Wells, Fargo & Co., the contractors for the transportation of said mail, have not provided adequate facilities for such transportation, and that express matter has been carried to the exclusion of the mail, which has been left upon the route "day after day and week after week, both day and night, entirely unprotected;" and that "on the 15th of November some six thousand pounds of mail matter lay piled up in an open stock yard at the head of Echo canon;" and whereas it is reported by the said agent that "there are strong indications that the agents of Wells, Fargo & Co., or their employees had a hand in rifling the letter mail;" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to make no payment to said Wells, Fargo & Co., until a full investigation can be made by the House in regard to the character of the contract made by said Wells, Fargo & Co. with the Post Office Department, and the truth of the charges of the said special agent of the Post Office Department touching the delinquency of said firm in carrying the mail.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to my colleague's being heard, provided I can have an opportunity to make a statement also.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have the floor now by unanimous consent. That is another matter. This House referred to the Committee on Appropriations a communication from the Postmaster General upon this subject. After examining that communication, together with other facts, including those contained in the report of the special agent, the committee directed the resolution which has just been read to be drawn up and offered for adoption by the House and in the mean time ordered that a copy should be sent to the Postmaster General, which was done. That officer came to the room of the Committee on Appropriations and said he had received the resolution, and that the pay of the contractors would be stopped. The resolution was offered on the first day that Congress met after the holidays, and its consideration was objected to. Of course, a single objection prevented action upon it by the House. I am now advised that the Postmaster General has determined, notwithstanding all the facts which have been made known, and notwithstanding he notified the Committee on Appropriations that payments were suspended, to make the payments upon the contract. Hence I ask that the resolution may be adopted to-day and sent to the Postmaster General under the sanction of the House, and then we will see whether he makes the payments or not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask for five minutes to reply to my colleague.

No objection was made.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suppose it is known to all the members of this House that contracts are made by the Postmaster General with parties for the conveyance of the mails in pursuance of law, and that the law authorizes the Postmaster General when the mails are not carried in accordance with the contract to fine the parties or to withhold such proportion of the contract price as it may seem to him proper to do. But a contract, while it is in existence between the contractor and the Post Office Department of the Government, has the force of law, and the Postmaster General cannot violate that contract by refusing to pay unless he has some authority to do so, and a mere resolution of the House of Representatives is not sufficient authority to the Postmaster General to refuse to perform his duty. Certainly a resolution of the House of Representatives instructing the Postmaster General so to do, when that resolution is based upon newspaper paragraphs or upon the outside statements of individuals, is not sufficient.

It will probably be recollected by members of the House who were here at the last session of Congress that Congress amended the law with reference to the transmission of the newspaper and document mails across the continent, opening the mails for the transmission by land of all the newspapers and heavy documents. This, of course, added very largely to the weight of the mails. I stated at that time what the bids were for the conveyance of these mails, and how that some of the parties had bid with reference to carrying the letter mails as the law then stood, and other parties had bid with reference to carrying the entire mails if we should amend the law and open the mails for the transportation of all the papers. It turned out as I stated to the House. In consequence of the passage of that law parties who had bid for carrying the letter-mails only refused to carry the mails, and did not execute a contract. The Postmaster General fell back upon Wells, Fargo & Co., and made a contract with them. The manner of doing so and the reasons for making the contract he has reported to the House by special communication as well as in his annual report. The whole amount for the conveyance of the mails in pursuance of that contract will probably not exceed $600,000 at the time the railroad is completed across the continent. One quarter or less than a quarter is now due.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I had some hesitation in bringing this matter up, because I did not believe really that the report which came to me was true, it was so extraordinary; but a letter has just been laid upon my desk from the Postmaster General which I desire to read to the House with the leave of my colleague.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, January 7, 1869.

SIR: An indefinite delay in payment for mail service by Wells, Fargo & Co. will work detriment to the postal service. The compensation is being so rapidly reduced, and the expenses of the company are so great, that I have determined to revoke the order suspending payment for service for the quarter just ended. The amount due for performing about five eighths of the whole service is about two hundred and ninety-seven thousand dollars. If the railroads are completed within the time now anticipated the whole expense of this service will not probably exceed $600,000, which is less than was anticipated when the contract was made. A full report is in preparation and a thorough investigation invited.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEX. W. RANDALL,
Postmaster General.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman Committee on Appropriations House of Representatives.

With the consent of my colleague I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to this extraordinary conduct of the Postmaster General. There has been no investigation of the charges that have been made. Notice has been given him that the payment ought to be suspended. He came in person to the Committee on Appropriations and said he had made the order; and now, without any investigation, when parties in this House have refused to have an investigation made, he has made a payment to these contractors of $280,000. I denounce the conduct as unworthy of an official. I believe it is such as should subject a man to impeachment. There are strong allegations of fraud in the first instance, and in another instance his own agent comes in and reports that the service has not been performed; and yet in defiance of this, in advance of any action by the House, he makes this payment of $280,000.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say a word in reply to what my colleague has said. I do not object to an investigation. I did not object the other day. I desire that an investigation shall be made. I am no champion of the Postmaster General or of Wells, Fargo & Co., but I do not believe in the right of the House of Representatives to interfere with the performance of a mail contract, and upon the mere statements of some outside parties, the ex parte statements of outsiders or a mere letter of a post office agent, without explanation, to postpone indefinitely the payment of the contract price for carrying the mails in accordance with a contract which has been properly made.

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] have expired.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask five minutes additional time.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to granting the gentleman from Illinois five minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The House must understand—if members from the eastern part of the country do not understand from conversation with members from the Pacific slope and Delegates from the Territories, they will understand in a very short time—something about the expense of equipping and running stages in that country. They will readily perceive the importance, the absolute necessity, of paying the contractors for conveying the mails as the money becomes due, in order to secure the proper transmission of the mails. The failure of the Department for one quarter to pay what is due to a contractor for carrying the mails in that country will pretty certainly insure the dropping of the mails and the cessation of the running of the stages. It is, I understand, in view of this fact that the Postmaster General has revoked, as he has stated in his communication to my colleague, the order refusing to pay the contractor for carrying the mails. And I confess, sir, that I approve the conduct of the Postmaster General in this particular. I think he has done perfectly right. In taking this action he, of course, knows better than I do whether there has been any fraud in making this contract. He has taken this action in full view of the fact that an investigation of the matter will probably be ordered by this House. The whole thing will be investigated; and if he is paying out money from the Treasury in pursuance of a contract which is fraudulent, and which shall hereafter be so proved, he, of course, takes the risk upon his shoulders. But if he is conscious that he has committed no fraud, and that these parties are in good faith performing their contract, I certainly approve and justify his course in paying them the contract price for carrying this mail, notwithstanding my colleague may have interposed a request that the contractors should not be paid. If I were a contractor for the Government and were performing my duties I should think it exceedingly hard that the Department should refuse to pay me for doing what I had agreed to do upon the mere request of a member of Congress, basing his request upon the flying newspaper reports that he might have cut from some of the public journals.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My time has nearly expired; but I will yield for a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague says that I base my action upon mere newspaper reports. The fact is, as the gentleman should know from the preamble which has been read at the Clerk's desk, that my resolution is based upon information furnished by an agent of the Post Office Department—an agent of this very Postmaster General.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I was just going to speak of that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This agent comes here and tells us and tells the country that this mail service has not been performed. And, sir, let me say to my colleague, who appears here to-day as the defender of the Postmaster General in this matter, that I could tell him other things in regard to this transaction which I think would make him hesitate to interpose his influence here to prevent an examination of this matter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, so far as regards the information obtained from Mr.

Ball, the special agent of the Post Office Department, I have read that. It was sent to this House by the Postmaster General with his own communication. Mr. Ball, it is true, speaks of several occasions some time ago—not many occasions—when he saw, as he says, large piles of mail matter—six thousand pounds; perhaps—piled up in an open yard. How is that explained? Why, sir, if my colleague had taken the pains that I have taken to investigate this matter; if he had examined other reports and other papers on file (for this report of Mr. Ball came from the Post Office Department) he would have found how the matter happened. Frequently, on account of storms, the Pacific railroad trains do not come in on time; they are a day or two behind hand. In the mean time no mail is brought in, and the stages have gone out empty. But the train comes in with all the accumulated mail matter, amounting, perhaps, to five or six tons, and it is dumped down. As fast as the railroad is extended an additional twenty-five or fifty miles a new depot is established, which is, of course, a very temporary affair, without proper buildings for the storage of the mails. The stages cannot carry off six tons of mail matter in one day—this heavy paper mail. What do they do? They are obliged to draw it off as they can: to take what they can on the stages to-day, then take what they can to-morrow, and the balance of it the day after, until it is all cleared up. That is the way it is done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELA. I ask five minutes to make a statement in regard to this matter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. One moment. If my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] has any other information on this subject that I am not possessed of, I hope he will state it to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will hear the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. TAFTE] upon this subject.

Mr. ELA. I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes upon the subject of this resolution.

No objection was made.

Mr. ELA. In reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in regard to the accumulation of this mail, I will state that in this document, which has been placed before this House by the Postmaster General, will be found the information that the mail which left the New York city post office during the entire month of October averaged two thousand eight hundred and forty-eight pounds, destined for Salt Lake City and beyond. And it will also appear from that same document of the Postmaster General, which embraces a statement of the postmaster at Salt Lake City, that the average weight of the mail received there during that same month of October was one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine pounds, or nine hundred and eighty-nine pounds less than the average weight which left New York city on each of the days in the month of October.

I will say in addition to that that the weight of the mail received at Salt Lake city ought to be very much more than it was when it left New York city, for one of the territorial Delegates told me this morning that he had seen bags of that mail matter tied under the stage in which he was a passenger, and dragged through four or five streams on the route. And the postmaster at Salt Lake City says that the mail bags come in there wet and frozen. And in addition to the mails sent from New York city, are the mails which accumulate from all the country west of New York city to go to Salt Lake city and the Pacific coast. And yet, as I have said, the mails received at Salt Lake city average nine hundred and eighty-nine pounds less than the mails sent from New York city alone.

Now I want to call the attention of members to one thing further in connection with this contract. It will be found by reference to this annual report of the Postmaster General, that he says he applied, on the 16th of October, to Mr. McLaughlin, who had submitted a bid of $350,000 to carry these mails, and asked him if he was ready to take the contract, to which he received no answer, and that in consequence of receiving no answer he went to New York city, and after consultation with gentlemen there, he made this contract with Wells, Fargo & Co. But in this very report is evidence that on October 17, and received at the Department on the 18th, Mr. McLaughlin informed the Department that he was ready to carry these mails in thirty days from notice, but the Department did not ask him to do it, and instead hunted up Wells, Fargo & Co., and made a contract with them to do it. That is not all. Notwithstanding the statement of the Postmaster General, to which I have referred, it will be found by reference to his report that Mr. McLaughlin informed the Department the very day after he was applied to that he was ready to carry the mails for the amount he had bid, and asked if he could have the contract. These are the facts contained in this document.

A gentleman told me within the last twenty-four hours that he came across the plains upon the coaches of Wells, Fargo & Co., and that they had but four horses for each fifteen miles each way, that there were eleven passengers on the stage. I would ask how, under those circumstances, they can expect them to carry even one ton of mail matter a day. The special agent of the Department says that he himself saw on the 27th of November the passengers and express matter of Wells, Fargo & Co. loaded on the stages while three thousand pounds of mail matter was left behind, piled up before their office. He declares that mail bags filled with newspapers, letters, and public documents are left piled up upon the ground day after day, and week after week, entirely unprotected, exposed to theft by anybody who may choose to take them. I might go on and make other like statements, but I do not wish unnecessarily to consume the time of the House.

Mr. TAFTE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAFTE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, in this connection, that I have received a great number of complaints on this subject. I live at Omaha upon this thoroughfare, and have lived there for twelve years. While I cannot say that I have personal knowledge that mail matter has been left upon the ground by Wells, Fargo & Co., yet, sir, I do know that there are a large number of responsible citizens who declare that they have seen mail matter piled up on the ground and left for days exposed to destruction. I know furthermore that Indians constantly bring in mail bags to the military posts that they have found thrown out and left upon the ground. Cartloads of mail bags are thus disposed of, as we are informed by responsible persons.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Can the gentleman tell whether letter or document mail bags are thus left piled up?

Mr. TAFTE. Both kinds. My information is that Wells, Fargo & Co. only carry mail matter when there is no express matter to be transported; and that when there is express freight they will carry it to the exclusion of mail matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent to be heard for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, from what has been said, being a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House, and having been consulted about this contract with other members of the committee and with members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, I deem it my duty to make an explanation. It is also proper that I should do so in view of the fact that I have crossed the plains during the last month. I can therefore contradict the statements which gentlemen have made to the inability of Wells, Fargo & Co. to perform this service. In view of these facts, I say, it is my duty to make a statement, and I will proceed to do so in as few words as possible. Wells, Fargo & Co. have more than four horses to each fifteen miles of the road.

A MEMBER. Each way?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; each way. They have more than eight; ay, more than twelve. They run two stages a day. In August last, when I crossed the plains upon my way home, they ran two stages daily; and I neither saw a scarcity of stock at the stations nor mail matter piled up in heaps upon the ground. I did not see any mail matter at all piled up on the ground; but, on the contrary, I saw extra stages on their way loaded down with mail matter, and without any passengers. And I apprehend that if the mails arrived regularly at the end of the railroad they could be taken by one or two stages a day; but they do not arrive regularly in consequence of accidents and delays on the railroad. For four days last month the trains ceased to run through, and all at once about sixteen thousand pounds of mail matter were landed at the terminus of the railroad. My time is brief, and I must leave this point.

When a contract is made by the Postmaster General under the law to carry the mails, I ask any lawyer upon this floor whether this Congress can instruct him to refuse to execute the terms of that contract? No, sir; this Congress cannot step in and pass a law to invalidate a contract made by the Government with its citizens. No lawyer here, careful of his reputation, will allege that we can pass a resolution instructing the Postmaster General to refuse to let the contractors carry the mails under the terms of their contract.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from California whether Wells, Fargo & Co. have not to transport the forage for their stock all the way from the Missouri river?

Mr. JOHNSON. They take all their forage from the Missouri river for that portion of the route this side of Bear river. Beyond that point it is obtained from Salt Lake valley pretty generally until you reach Stockton, in Utah, beyond which the forage is obtained from the Pacific coast and hauled in wagons to the different stations.

Mr. MULLINS. I would ask the gentleman whether the contract on the part of the Government was to be conditional about these men hauling their provisions—whether the Government should allow them to haul their provisions to the exclusion of the mail?

Mr. JOHNSON. I apprehend that they do not haul six or eight tons of hay on a stage loaded with passengers. I stated that I supposed the forage was carried on wagons. Now I will state another fact. The Postmaster General did not want to give Wells, Fargo & Co. this contract to my certain knowledge.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; but as my time has expired I will have to ask for three minutes more to answer the question and complete what I have to say.

No objection being made, the gentleman's time was extended three minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. Speaking of the Postmaster General having no authority to suspend the payment of the contract, I would ask the gentleman if it is not his duty as the agent of the Government, if Wells, Fargo & Co. have failed to perform their contract, to suspend payment until he is required to pay them by law?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the law. When the service is not performed according to the stipulations and conditions of the contract he may fine the parties or withhold a portion of the pay. He is bound by the law, and the contractors are bound by it, and we can pass no act to-day that will deprive Wells, Fargo, & Co. of their rights under the contract.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman does not quite understand my question. Suppose Wells, Fargo & Co. had made a contract to carry the mails but had not carried one ounce of mail matter under it, do you think he would be authorized to pay the contractors anything?

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course not. He would not be authorized to pay them one cent.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, then, the principle is the same. If there has been a violation of the contract on their part it is his duty as agent of the Government not to pay them until he is directed to do so by law.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Whose duty is it to find out the violation?

Mr. LOGAN. His own agent, I understand, has reported the fact. It is the agents of the Department who find out whether the contracts are performed or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Postmaster General exceeds his authority or fails to perform his duty I have no objection to his conduct being investigated—none in the world. But I do not wish that the proper pay, whatever it may be, should be withheld from Wells, Fargo & Co., which would have the effect to deprive the people of the Pacific coast of their mail facilities. If we say to the Postmaster General do not pay, and he follows our direction, Wells, Fargo & Co. will cease to carry the mails and we shall be deprived entirely of that mail service on the Pacific coast.

One word more and I have done. The Postmaster General informs the House in his letter, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, that the sum paid to Wells, Fargo & Co. is not adequate to defray the expenses incurred by that company in the transportation of the mail by some $200,000; in other words, that that company are losing $200,000 by the contract made with the Government. Now, I do not know whether there is any fraud in it or not.

Mr. ELA. I ask for five minutes to make a reply to the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELA. My curiosity in this matter grew out of the fact that I happened to board for some time last summer with one of the bidders for this contract, and he declared to me that as soon as he had left for the California coast there would be some way contrived by which this bidder (Spaids) would be got out of the way, and Wells, Fargo & Co. would get the contract, and when I saw that his prediction had been verified, I had some little curiosity to look into the matter.

The gentleman says the Postmaster General was reluctant to make this contract with Wells, Fargo & Co., and yet what will you find? You will find that when there was a necessity for making a contract for carrying these mails with somebody, Mr. Spaids, a contractor, was in this city in communication with the Postmaster General, and informing him that a letter would reach him addressed to S. P. Brown & Son, of this city, and yet when it came to the making of the contract, instead of inquiring of the man here in this city whether he was getting ready to do this business, they went off telegraphing after Oakes Ames to find out where General Dodge was, to inquire whether any preparations were being made to stock the road! So much for that.

Now, if you will look into this document you will find, I think, on page 69, an agent of the Post Office declaring that Wells, Fargo & Co. are getting twelve and a half cents express on each letter, and hence their reluctance to supply the post offices. You will find this document full of interesting reading in relation to this matter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman from New Hampshire to charge that Wells, Fargo & Co. refuse to supply the post offices?

Mr. ELA. I say that the agent of the Post Office Department, in this document submitted to the House by the Postmaster General, declares that Wells, Fargo & Co. are charging twelve and a half cents for the delivery of each letter, and hence their reluctance to supply the post offices.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman mean to say that they charge twelve and a half cents for delivering letters through the mail?

Mr. ELA. No, through their express; and hence their reluctance to supply the post offices with mails.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire again whether the gentleman charges that Wells, Fargo & Co. refuse to leave the mails at the designated post offices?

Mr. ELA. I simply repeat what is stated in this document, that Wells, Fargo & Co. left the mail-bags, the letter-bags, and everything of that character, piled up, week after week, in front of their office, which is pretty good evidence they did not mean to furnish the post offices.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is not the point. I do not suppose that the firm of Wells, Fargo & Co. is composed of loafers or very mean men. I believe they have some character in the United States; and when I hear a gentleman upon this floor charge by innuendo that Wells, Fargo & Co. refuse to deliver the mails to the designated post offices, I want to know what his authority is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. ELA. This report.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There is no such report.

Mr. ELA. I cannot yield to the gentleman any longer. I have made no innuendo against Wells, Fargo & Co. I have simply stated what the Postmaster General has sent to this House as a fact in the case, and if the defenders of Wells, Fargo & Co. have any quarrel with anybody they have it with the Postmaster General and not with me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single statement in regard to the document which he has before him?

Mr. ELA. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It contains a copy of a dispatch sent to the honorable Senator from Vermont, Mr. MORRILL, who was invited to come down here to see the parties, but there is no answer to that dispatch given. The dispatch inviting him to come here is given, but the answer of the Senator is suppressed.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, no.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague is mistaken; the answer is there in the document.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If it is there it has been put in since the Senator complained to the Postmaster General that it was suppressed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It was in the document as it came in in answer to my colleague's request several weeks ago, and my colleague has overlooked it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Senator from Vermont told me—I do not know but that he was mistaken—that he saw the dispatch which was sent to him given without his answer, and he complained to the Postmaster General that the answer had not been sent in, and the Postmaster General gave as an excuse for not having sent it in that he considered it an unofficial letter, but he said he would send it. If the gentleman has other information let him give it to the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The answer is in the document.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The answer, which will speak for itself if it is here, was putting the Postmaster General upon his guard against making such a contract; just such an answer as might have been expected from the Senator.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I desire to correct a statement made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA.] and I ask to be allowed three or four minutes to do so.

No objection was made.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Before the gentleman from Montana [Mr. CAVANAUGH] proceeds I desire to correct a statement of my colleague. It is unfair to the Senator from Vermont and to the Postmaster General to allow the statement to go uncontradicted. The answer of the Senator from Vermont, as I saw it yesterday, is in that document pretty nearly in these words: "I cannot leave at present." I do not understand how that can put any one on his guard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That was the answer to the dispatch by telegraph. But the Senator wrote a letter to the Postmaster General, going into this whole subject. This letter, which was semi-official, was suppressed by the Postmaster General, of which the Senator from Vermont complained.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague did not before say anything about a letter; he spoke about the answer to the dispatch.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The answer was contained in the letter.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I desire to correct a statement made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA.] and I think I can do so, for I had the contradiction from the mouth of Mr. Spaids himself. When Mr. Spaids bid $350,000 for carrying this mail across the continent he went to New York for the purpose of trying to enter into an arrangement with Wells, Fargo & Co. I was present in the office of Wells, Fargo & Co. at the time. There was no agreement made between the parties. Mr. Spaids then said to me, using a profane adjective, that he was not fool enough to take that contract only for the letter mail and to leave the printed matter out entirely. That statement I had from him.

I know there has been a great deal of fault found with Wells, Fargo & Co. for the manner in which they have carried the mails. I know, from my own experience, that heretofore these mails have not been carried properly. I know that mail-bags have been piled up along the route. I know these parties have failed fully to discharge their duty in this respect, but I believe they have fulfilled their obligations as far as it was in their power to do so. They have delivered the mails as well as they possibly could under the circumstances and at this season of the year. I care nothing about where they got their supplies. In my own Territory all their supplies along the line of road where they travel are furnished in the Territory. We have some complaints to make of them in Montana, but not such as are made by the gentleman from New Hampshire. I believe that Wells, Fargo & Co. are doing the best they possibly can. In the winter season, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, it is not as easy to carry the mails from Echo cañon to Salt Lake City as it is from here to Baltimore. But I will not dwell upon this matter any further. I rose merely to correct the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the resolution be now voted upon.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent for the resolution to be received and acted upon at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

ESTIMATE OF DEFICIENCIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate of deficiencies of appropriations for the Government building at the corner of F and Seventeenth streets, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PURCHASE OF LAND, OMAHA, NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of correspondence between the War Department and Lieutenant General Sherman, relative to the purchase of certain land at Omaha, Nebraska, for military purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SIoux INDIANS ON UPPER MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of Brevet Major General Harney, United States Army, upon the Sioux Indians on the Upper Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OBSTRUCTIONS AT HELL GATE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 14th ultimo, a report upon the removal of obstructions to navigation at Hell Gate, Long Island sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. TAYLOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of William F. Taylor, auditor of public accounts of the State of Virginia, for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

E. W. ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of E. W. Anderson, formerly a cadet of the United States Military Academy, for removal of political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the President's message of 1867.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CULLOM in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message of 1867.

FINANCES AND CURRENCY.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Chairman, there are subjects discussed in Congress within the scope of legislation, and some beyond it. At this time many believe that a return to specie payment can be accomplished by the passage of a law; others think that such an object can no more be secured in this way than a change of the seasons, a plentiful crop, or a standard of prices; that legislation can no more determine the value of gold a year or two hence than it can establish the price of wheat, corn, cotton, or merchandise; that something beside the phrase "be it enacted" is needed to give or take from values; and, in fine, that the most dangerous heresy in political economy is the assertion that legislative power can override the great laws of trade, and make that which is worthless valuable, define prices as it would offenses, and put limits to business as it would to human conduct.

The fact is, we can no more pay debts by legislation than we can forgive sins; and we can no more make by law a greenback equal to a gold dollar, now or at any future time, than we can make a bushel of wheat or a yard of cloth equal to the same coin by the same process. The object of legislation is to remove obstructions, to regulate the channels of trade, and not to fix prices or dictate values. Supply and demand governed by the changing seasons, by peace and war, health and sickness, by fashion, whim, and the caprice of mankind, by migration, by the thousand social influences beyond and below the reach of law, which modify or rule men, all go together to fix values and prices.

All efforts to determine by arbitrary power a day on which a paper dollar shall be equal to a gold dollar must result in failure. That day will come, but not as the result of a law of Congress. That day will come, but it will be when the confidence of men in the stability of this Government rests unshaken; when we have repaired the ravages of war; when the whole nation has gone again peacefully and heartily to hard work; when, as a consequence, our wealth has vastly increased, our supply of gold has trebled or quadrupled; when our credit as individuals and as a people is founded upon the rocks of prosperous thrift. Tell me that day, and I will tell you when to put into your law the date of return to specie payments. Till then the people will be well pleased with greenbacks, "depreciated," "debased." And, having confidence in the Government, they are glad to get the "depreciated," "debased," "dishonored," "irredeemable" stuff in exchange for labor and property. And many are so much deluded with it as to believe that it is the very best paper currency we ever had. Better surely than wild-cats and shinplasters; better than individual notes; better than the promises of local corporations, good only within the range of personal acquaintance or district business; better than free banks founded on State stocks; better than State banks whose credit was limited by State lines; better than the old United States Bank; having at least one value all over the land, and passing current cheerfully everywhere. Good enough for the laborer, good enough for the capitalist, good enough for the officer, good enough for the merchant, good enough in market, good enough on 'Change, good enough at present everywhere at home, except in payment of interest on our debt. And good enough there but for our honorable and ever-binding promise to pay it in gold.

And now, before entering upon a discussion of these questions, let me protest against the moral lectures of our opponents in debate.

Their arguments for certain measures proposed in aid of an early resumption of specie payments are accompanied by a long homily upon an honest compliance with our contracts and upon the importance of national integrity. Just as if there could be no sincere difference of opinion as to the methods of resumption; as if it were a question of morals and not of policy; and that all who do not favor instant or early resumption were stained with a disregard of the public faith. To such let it be said that the true friends of resumption may yet be found among those who think the day of its complete accomplishment still distant and indefinitely in the future, and who have little faith in making efforts in that direction which they think can but result in disastrous failure—in a collapse of our credit and a general suspension of business. He who with inadequate forces would rashly storm the breastworks of the enemy can have no higher claim for patriotism and devotion than that other man who delays, at the risk of censure, till he has gathered strength and found his opportunity, and thereby made success certain.

Let it, then, be conceded by both sides that honorable men may disagree upon these grave questions, and that each are striving, as best they can, to put the credit of the Treasury where they have put the prowess of our arms—beyond the reach of doubt or inquiry.

The question then arises, what can Congress do to aid in the appreciation of the currency? Contraction has been tried and failed. The experience of the three past years has demonstrated that a contraction of one fourth of our paper currency has not diminished the difference between it and specie one cent. It would seem to be madness to press such a measure further with falling prices, stagnated trade, and paralyzed enterprise. Our paper currency at this time amounts to about the sum of six hunfred and eighty million dollars in actual circulation, while the bank reserves, amounting to $150,000,000, are to be deducted from the circulation, leaving for active use about five hundred and thirty million dollars. This exceeds the amount we had before the war but $40,000,000 on a specie basis, nearly three fifths of it being coin. This is not as large a volume as the same population in France and England have, with the additional advantage of a very limited territory and compact settlement, with large commercial and manufacturing cities and great accumulations of capital in banking institutions. Our scattered population, their agricultural pursuits, their lack of moneyed centers conveniently located, their growth, their changing and enlarging currents of business, all would seem to require more currency in the hands of the people and at their command, as borrowers at moderate rates, instead of less than the people of the Old World.

The effects of a too long-continued contraction of the currency are as detrimental as those of a commercial panic. The one is like the exhaustion of a slow fever; the other like the dread effects of epilepsy; both drawing near the gates of death; both ending in bankruptcy and ruin; both often the result of artificial or temporary causes—not consequent upon a loss or diminution or destruction of capital, but merely a locking up of the means and tools to handle it. Solvent men, solvent firms, solvent banks, guilty of no mismanagement or dishonesty, are thus crushed, and the truest and best managers of business broken down. No man dare write any harsher term than "bad luck" opposite the names of thousands thus shipwrecked. An unreasonable, though gradual, diminution of the currency, like the drawing off of the blood through a small vein, may be just as fatal as cutting the jugular itself.

When peace was made there was one natural mode of reducing war prices, and that was by an increase of production. More than a million and a half of vigorous men laid down their arms and entered the fields of labor, thronged their old shops and factories and places of merchandise; sought out farms and fisheries again, or deployed amid the mines of the far West. Every way in life found these active men pressing forward. From being mere consumers, they now began to add to the stock on hand, and values must decline.

But this was not deemed sufficiently effective in bringing them down, and the additional method of a reduction of the currency was adopted. Few men had reasoned upon this system or its effects. It was an experiment without a parallel. True, other nations had incurred vast debts, but none other had such unlimited energies, such growth, such enterprise, such recuperative power; in none other was capital so valuable, was labor so well rewarded, was invention so much stimulated, were moneyed adventures so successful. Here was a land in which the real estate was as much in market as were the grain and live stock, the products of the plantation or the fishery, as manufactures or merchandise. Not so in England and European countries, where monarchs, noblemen, capitalists; laws of entail, and a barbarous system held out of market all or nearly all the land, and whatever was added to it required never to be lifted by a currency, but was laid down and cemented, like the rocks in the pyramids, to be handled no more forever. Here was a people making railroads into and over vast tracts of unsettled country, adding yearly many millions to values, and opening to culture, settlement, and successful use that which had been worthless till then. Here was a people who could, and who did by thousands, take the chopping-ax, the blacksmith's hammer, the hoe and plow, the simplest tools, worth but a few dollars, and in a short time build up happy, valuable homes, and even great fortunes; a thing utterly unheard of and impossible to the masses in Europe.

And yet to guide us we took the rules which should govern the plodding, cramped, fettered, enslaved, ignorant nations of the Old World; put on the shackles which Adam Smith or Ricardo had found were fitted and worn into the flesh of the subjects and slaves of a thousand years of tyranny, and expected them to fit us and hold us. They undertook to measure the man who earns, buys, builds, creates a comfortable home, or even a splendid one, with the man who works as his father did and his fathers' fathers have done for ten generations past, in the colliery or as a farm servant, without in all that time the accumulation of a dollar; who lives in a land where thirty thousand men hold the soil on which twenty millions live, and the number of whose landholders has diminished two thirds in one hundred and fifty years; a land in which labor is but thirty to fifty cents a day; where starvation stands at the door of the laborer, and the workhouse is almost his certain doom in sickness and old age; where the free school sheds no light upon childhood, and an odious system of church aristocracy degrades the holy ordinances of religion; where the working and middle classes pay five sevenths of the taxes, while the landed aristocracy pay but two sevenths, thus exhausting and impoverishing the yeoman year after year, placing them in the grasp of greedy landlords, and reducing them to the condition of serfs. How different from our own condition! We find no parallels upon which to base our theories of political economy. In no nation but ours has it been possible for one set of men to push out, build mills, bridges, roads, railways, hotels, factories, and cities, and, failing utterly, to be succeeded at once, like the second line of a storming party, by another throng of men, fresh, daring, and strong, who seize these enterprises, and out of their wreck and ruin build colossal fortunes, run the machinery, people the waste places, and make them centers of business and prosperity. Where else is failure the herald and forerunner of success? Where else are great cities built upon a soil shingled with mortgages drawing enormous rates of interest? Where before ever did the world behold so much financial success founded upon so much financial ruin?

Looking at the growth of the country, and the consequent increase of business, the natural conclusion is that we need an expansion instead of a contraction of the currency. The demand for labor, the supply of labor, the products of labor are increasing, capital is increasing; why should not their representative in value? The demand for capital seems so far to be unlimited. We are not situated as Florence, Venice, Palermo, Alexandria, and Genoa, were, with a surplus upon which to do banking business or to expend upon the erection of gorgeous palaces, splendid churches, fountains, stately pictures, glittering equipages, gems, jewelry, ornaments, dress, and luxurious living. Our great houses are hotels or places of business; our aqueducts bring water for the poor to drink and use or to turn the busy wheel. Our annual outlay of millions is for the comfort of the people, for great charities, for education, for use, for help, for light. A few localities as such may approach the banker condition. Hartford, Providence, Boston, New Bedford have large accumulations, but New England is still a workshop, not a loan office. While we in the West are satisfied with full rations, a sheltering roof, plenty of work, and plenty of money at ten per cent., Yankee enterprise finds every day ready outlay for the previous day's accumulations, and that, too, in permanent investments that secure and give employment to industrious hands.

So far Yankee wealth has been devoted mainly to the great charities, to the great educators of man, to the great uses of life, and not in erecting idle pyramids or drowsy towers or unthrifty chateaus or luxurious palaces, yielding only profit to the builder, and taxing all his descendants for their repairs, tenantry, and support. Here interest is at an enormous rate. Capital being scarce, labor rushes for it to secure its help in lifting business and developing trade, while the Old World willingly pays but from two to three per cent.

It is safe to say, then, in view of all our experience, that we cannot be governed as to the management of our currency and debt by measures and a policy which have proved wise and successful in countries of slow growth, of little activity, of greater capital and less enterprise. And yet, as before remarked, we have far less currency to the individual than our English and French neighbors; the former having about twenty-six and the latter about thirty dollars, paper and metallic, to the head. At English rates, if we were paying specie, we would have about eight hundred millions, and according to French rates near eleven hundred million dollars in circulation, instead of six hundred and seventy millions, a large part of it lying as a reserve in bank vaults. Business demands an enlarged volume of our currency, and the difficulty of the case is not upon this point, but upon the methods to be adopted to give it an increased value and bring it to par.

One word upon the subject of expansion and the mere volume of currency. For more than a thousand years previous to the discovery of America the precious metals became scarcer. The New World furnished a vast supply—the robbery of Mexico and Peru, and the opening of their mines threw a flood of gold and silver upon the world; the result was an unparalleled activity in business everywhere. This supply was continued up till the year 1809, when it continued falling off till 1840. Commercial distress ensued only to be relieved by the opening of the Russian, Californian, and Australian mines. The volume of the world's currency was increased and prosperity followed; diminished, and everything languished.

A glance at the prices of gold for the last six years, covering the period of our greatest inflations of paper currency from their beginning to the present time will show at the outset the inherent difficulty in legislating so as to give to specie or paper a permanent and fixed value. From these it will be seen that at the periods of the greatest expansion, in 1865 and 1866, gold was selling at a lower rate than when paper was hundreds of millions of dollars less abundant.

The following tables show the course of the gold market for the past six years:

Will the simple declaration that a paper dollar is as good as a gold dollar; will writing the word "resumed" over the Treasury door effect anything? That declaration was made when Congress passed the act making the paper dollar a legal tender. Why repeat it? Will the manifesto that we will pay at the Treasury gold for greenbacks have any effect? Surely not, unless it is followed by the fact and the gold goes out. And how long would it take to exhaust the store there when gold is at a premium of thirty-five cents? How long would it take three hundred and fifty-six millions to swallow ninety? Who could or would forbear to make the profit? Three months would not elapse till every gold dollar had been drawn from the Treasury.

But aside from this, the effect of a return to specie payments, were it feasible, would be to inflict suffering on the many, while a few would be benefited. The difficulties of conducting trade, the heavy weight of all debts, mortgages, and contracts for money, would be made more oppressive, with taxes now become more burdensome. The effect of a diminution of the currency depopulated great provinces in imperial Rome, and recently in England, from 1810 to 1830, and created great distress. Just so does the increase of trade and population without an increase of the currency operate. Money becomes scarce and the working population suffer the deepest misery. The gold discoveries of the last twenty years have kept pace somewhat with improvements and the extension of trade and production, and have saved mankind from the evils of hard times which must inevitably have resulted from the enlargement of business.

While the value of specie is going down the few suffer, or rather lose, while the many gain and reap the advantage; all debts become proportionally lessened, contracts are more easily complied with, mortgages are lifted, taxes are easily paid. The salaries of officers are comparatively less. Trade increases, employments multiply, and laboring men prosper. Substantial improvements are made, bold enterprises are undertaken, and great public works completed.

This is history. And yet statesmen would bring us down to a specie basis. And what is a specie basis? Men talk about the currency of the world and a fixed standard of values. Does a day's labor in China produce the same amount in gold that it does in England, in Japan that it does in California? Has a day's food the same value in the one place as the other? What is there that is fixed by this currency of the world? It passes everywhere abroad at a discount. Gold is taken as bullion in Europe, is tabooed in Asia, and loses its relative value as compared with silver, which is prized as a currency. It is, after all, but a comparative standard, somewhat better than paper, but not perfect, not satisfactory.

Let no one understand me as asserting that paper currency can ever be as safe and good as gold, but to say that gold has its fluctuations, its limits, and is often governed in value by the mere caprice of nations, as arbitrary and absolute as the statutes that authorize the issue of legal tenders. Mankind do not take gold and silver currency at a fixed value, but at one quite variable. I may be pardoned, then, for saying that to shift our entire monetary system from the fluctuating surface of paper currency to the less but still fluctuating surface of specie at once, with our vast private indebtedness outstanding, is a project that admits of the most serious question.

How much better is any project to hoard gold in the Treasury in order to diminish its value by paying it out again? The act of hoarding and heaping it up effectually withdraws it not only from circulation, but also, as an article of commerce, from market; makes its scarcer, raises the price, diminishes the supply. The best calculators can find nowhere in the land three hundred millions of gold; the people do not hold it, nor the banks, nor the States, nor the Treasury—it is not here; it has gone off for imports and interest, and vanished in use in the arts. We have no reliable evidence of the presence of two hundred millions of specie. But even three hundred millions of gold would not quite suffice us for interest for two years and a half if not a dollar was withdrawn by the forbearing and merciful dealers in gold. And if we had it in the Treasury to-day, twelve months would not see a cent there, beside a portion of the amount we raised by duties upon imports, and these duties would be drawn from the Treasury to go back again, less the expense of collecting and transferring, since no importer will buy gold so long as he can draw it at par from the Treasury. Let us see, then, what goes with the $300,000,000 we have on hand the first year. At least $126,000,000 go for interest, $150,000,000 are drawn out for duties, leaving $24,000,000 for the redemption of greenbacks generally. Can we safely say that no more than $24,000,000 will be demanded for imports, for speculation, and other purposes? Will not the banks need more than this sum; for they, too, must redeem in gold? But you say, "Confidence will spring up." Confidence in what? Certainly not in the continued ability of the Government to pay specie. For although the $150,000,000 drawn out for duties come back with which to begin the second year, there are but $24,000,000 to add it to in the Treasury—beside the empty word confidence; and this year finds us with $174,000,000 on hand with which to pay $276,000,000, namely, the $126,000,000 of interest and the drain of $150,000,000 for duties. We have then paid out our last dollar, and want $102,000,000 to meet the demand. All this time not a cent is drawn out by individuals or banks, but they are satisfied with and feasting on "confidence." They will neither need specie for private debts or for redemption.

Again: should we succeed in hoarding gold, who dare say that it will be cheaper, after three years accumulations, at the rate of $100,000,000 a year? Common experience tells us that it will be even dearer than now, so that the illustration of beginning specie payments at once, as given, is a fair one. Such an experiment, if successful, would result in disaster, fluctuations in prices, derangement of business, and the crushing of enterprise. It cannot be made in safety.

But there is an insuperable objection to it, and that is its impossibility. Where is our surplus of gold to hoard? Do we or do we not expect to raise more money than we need to pay expenses, interest, pensions, bounties, and claims? Every cent we can possibly raise must go to pay these. Where, then, is our surplus to come from—our mountain of gold? Who will give it to us? Who will find it for us? Will that sorcerer men talk about and call "confidence"—will he do it? No one else can. Will he take us up on the mountain and give us the world as a Christmas gift? Must we eternally brag of our respectability in order to be respectable, and make boasts that we will pay when we know that we have not the means, and will not have them? A coward blusters, a brave man never does; a prostitute may make display of her virtue, the true woman does not; the honest man by a direct course gains and holds confidence, and not by making fair promises which he cannot perform. We have no surplus of gold in the Treasury; we cannot now put it there, and we do not expect to have it there.

You may dam up the streamlet as it trickles down the valley, and after months and years of accumulations of its little store of waters form a lake upon whose margin you may erect a mill, but how long will the head of water you have gained turn the ponderous wheel? A few days or a few weeks at most, and its motion suspends. The supply given at so much expense and loss of time is but a mockery to the man of enterprise, and the idle mill will nod and fall down in ruin into the idle pond.

The people have borne burdens enough within the few past years without now being called upon to pile up a golden surplus of hundreds of millions to delight the eyes of the greedy for a few brief months and then vanish like a dream. The people have something else to do than heap up gold. Their sinews, bones, and blood have been put in the scale; their precious lives, their health, hope, home, happiness, all. And now Shylock comes and says, "Pile up your gold, pile up your gold, so that I can see its yellow reflection fall on my greenbacks and make them glitter, too." The word of the people is good, but they are not ready to make rash promises to please Shylock. He must wait till the bond falls due; he must keep still till then. Silence is his part till the day of grace is past. This generation has lifted the enormous burdens of war; paid vast debts; distributed uncounted and almost incalculable charities and bounties; is dispensing to the shattered or helpless wrecks of the strife nearly forty millions a year; is paying honestly $126,000,000 of annual interest on the debt; is carrying on the great work of reconstruction; is fighting, pacifying, and settling the Indians; is making the Pacific railroad the crowning work of human construction; is doing it all cheerfully, beside supporting every interest of the people bountifully.

And this is enough. They desire to move on quietly for a time, to rest, if possible, to recuperate, to adjust the load and not to take on fresh burdens; if expenses can be cut off anywhere to do so; if extravagance or waste is found at any point to put an end to it; if taxes can be lifted from any industry or property safely to have it done. The very last thing they want is to have fresh burdens put on them, to have taxes increased, to be collecting a surplus, to be piling up a hoard. It may then be asserted with some confidence that a return to specie payment by hoarding gold is an impossibility. For first, it is impossible to raise the necessary amount by taxation; the people cannot and will not be taxed for such a purpose in addition to their present burdens. Second. It is impossible to diminish the price of gold by making it scarcer. Third. It is impossible to continue specie payments any length of time even if a hoard is collected. Fourth. It is impossible to get the gold for the hoard since it is not in the country, and its very scarcity will defeat the measure. This is no time for experiment that may become a mighty engine of oppression.

Will the issuing of Treasury notes payable in twelve months in gold, in lieu of the greenbacks and bank notes taken for taxes and dues to the Government, have any tendency toward the resumption of specie payments? This proposition has been made in all seriousness by a decided opponent of contraction, and is put forth as a measure in aid of that view. To my mind it is the strongest measure of contraction yet proposed, amounting to nearly a half a million a day—in fine, to the entire amount of the revenue raised in paper; for this paper is at once retired, and in its stead is issued a currency which calls for gold in twelve months, and which at once is worth more than twenty-five per cent. premium; a currency which would be locked up as soon as issued and only see daylight when put up for sale by bankers or at the end of twelve months when presented at the Treasury.

Who that holds such a note will give it in exchange for a greenback and throw away his twenty-five per cent.? Who will pay it out? Who so infatuated as to yield up such a golden advantage? In one year $180,000,000 of our currency would be safely locked up and the whole greenback circulation would be effectually retired at the end of two years, leaving nothing but bank notes to be used as paper money, with an issue of gold notes equal to the greenback circulation as a preferred currency if used as such at all, and subject at all times to become depreciated by a run upon the Treasury to the present standard of greenbacks. If the Government could for a short time succeed in redeeming these notes the effect upon the bank currency must be disastrous unless it too became at once redeemable in gold. And the whole scheme vanishes into thin air when we come back to the point of view in which we perceive that there is a total lack of the precious metals in the country with which to accomplish the work of redemption. The only effect of this measure will be at first to contract the currency at the rate of $15,000,000 a month, and when the bubble bursts to give the people promises no better than greenbacks, with the stain of broken faith upon them.

Such promises placed in the hands of the national banks calling for gold would be pressed for payment to supply their own wants, and the result would be that the Treasury would have to suspend such demands or fail to pay the interest on the public debt. The currency would be completely under the control of the national banks, and they could, by pressure, at any day break down the credit of the Government and create the most enormous fluctuations in the value of the circulating medium. This dangerous power should never be given to any association, however wise and patriotic.

Nor yet can we give value to our currency by issuing bonds or certificates of deposit with a low rate of interest for such amounts of greenbacks as may be surrendered or deposited in the Treasury to be withdrawn at pleasure. This, too, is a measure of contraction, and may retire many millions of our currency. This, in addition, increases the interest-bearing debt, adds to our burdens, for which we gain no earthly advantage, not a cent; makes nothing more secure, and in no wise increases the stock of gold on hand.

The nation does not want to pay interest on deposits—can use them in no possible way to enhance her credit—and encumber herself with a large amount of funds for which sound bankers at our money centers are unwilling to pay interest. How can the Government profit by a scheme which the best bankers refuse to adopt as unsafe and harmful, when they have the additional advantage in making loans of their deposits, while these would lay idle in the Government vaults? The result of this effort will be a loss of the entire expense of such transactions and every cent of interest without the gain of a mill. Nowhere have greenbacks accumulated so as to become depreciated for want of a profitable investment; and the Government has other functions than to become the holder of trust funds for the benefit of improvident money owners, who have not enterprise enough to handle their means properly. Whenever individuals need guardians to care for their property society has provided regular methods of procuring them, and ample hospitals in which to lodge the unfortunate wards. As a general rule the money-makers and dealers of the land can take care of themselves, and need no such protection, while the Government has enough to do beside assuming the shelter of such gentle lambs as crowd the gold-room or hold forth in the banking houses and brokers' offices of the land.

Nor is such a provision needed as a remedy against any measure of inflation to an amount within $300,000,000, for we have already by experience proved that with that much more paper currency we had not a redundancy; that still money bore good rates of interest and prices were not excessive. In fact, that paper was nearer gold under such circumstances than it is now, and that money sought the healthy channels of prosperous business. These remedies and such as these for the appreciation of our paper currency are like applications to the surface for a deep-seated and constitutional disease; like lopping off branches to cure a canker situated in the root or heart of a tree, temporary, superficial, ineffectual. To attempt to make the promises of the Government which bear no interest worth more than those which do would seem vain; to attempt to make irredeemable promises better than those which are redeemable, and with interest in gold, would, under ordinary circumstances, seem preposterous; to attempt to give par value to twenty-two hundred millions of promises now held at twenty-five cents discount by propping up for a few months three hundred and fifty millions of promises made by the same party would seem to be madness itself.

Once admit that the payment of three hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks is more important than of the entire balance of the debt, and all measures to pay greenbacks or enhance their value assume a gravity worthy of consideration. But not until men can be convinced that the lesser is superior to the greater will many of them believe that the credit of the Government rests primarily upon the payment or non-payment of greenbacks. Most men believe that a pyramid rests better on its base than its apex. To the beclouded mind of the Pottawatomie the great green earth rested upon the back of a turtle, and he reposed in turn upon a fox, and his feet rested upon the back of a goose. Here the fabled support ceased, and although the earth was "all right on the goose," the Indian's philosophy failed to indicate upon what foundation the goose rested.

Not much better than this is the greenback foundation of the public debt. Put the great matters of the public debt upon a solid basis, and then the greenbacks will take care of themselves.

The bulk of the debt once brought to par, the interest-bearing promises once raised to a level with their face, the bonds once brought into full credit in the commercial world, and greenbacks will be at par. It is the vast indebtedness of the Government outside of the currency that keeps it below par. This debt drains the Treasury of gold, takes away the supply for interest which we would otherwise have and use for redemption, leaves nothing but empty vaults to echo empty promises. It is impossible for us to raise by taxation and tariff enough to pay interest and redeem. We can barely pay the interest.

The unsettled condition of the country since the civil war, the war itself, the division in sentiment of the people as to all the issues, the vast amount of claims unadjusted and due, the possibility of paying a great portion of the debt in greenbacks, the contingency of a vast expansion of the currency, the want of a permanent and solid policy, have made capitalists undervalue our bonds, and kept them apparently far below their real position. In the minds of many, especially foreign capitalists, our Government is yet an experiment that may explode in failure at any moment. Its strength, solidity, and permanency are not established. To them another war, another debt, another draft, another political earthquake is possible. Time, with a firm and honest course, can alone restore confidence.

Another expedient resorted to for temporary relief by the clamorous advocates of specie payment is that of authorizing contracts to be made payable in gold. This, it is alleged, will draw out the hoarded gold now hid away in mysterious and unfathomable recesses, will make it a currency, and of course bring down its value, for it can only become a currency by coming on a level with paper. How such a measure can be effectual in diminishing the price of gold is beyond ordinary comprehension. How an increase of the demand for gold, more than doubled, is to cut down its price has not yet been pointed out by the friends of this measure. The passage of such a law would be probably followed by the making of contracts payable in specie to a large amount. We can safely expect that at the end of twelve months a larger amount will be due on private contracts than is due by the Government. Where would the price of gold go if, in addition to the $125,000,000 that must come every year for interest, $300,000,000 more must be procured and paid by individuals? To say that it would go up fifty per cent., considering its scarcity, would not be unreasonable.

It may be safely expected that the passage of such a law would find every debtor forced to an extension under the penalty of renewing his contract payable in gold; and our merchants who purchased of importers foreign goods could only do so upon the promise of their payment in gold. Indeed, experience has shown that wherever the law authorized contracts giving advantage to creditors, the advantage ground was immediately taken and never relinquished until its repeal or the bankruptcy of the debtors ensued. The war between debtor and creditor began many thousand years ago, and this is not the occasion to repeat the old story of a struggle which will be continued till the golden rule shall become the fixed standard of human conduct and a coinage purer and brighter than that of the mint shall pass current among men and nations.

But some one may say, "You are pleading in behalf of debtors who have failed to meet their obligations, and who deserve no sympathy or help." To such a one I answer, government was not organized, nor is society held together for the protection of the rich and strong. To shield the weak from oppression, to rescue the improvident from the avaricious, to hold back the grasping from the unwary, to give light to those in darkness, to educate, to give strength, to help the helpless help themselves are the objects of Governments. Let him who says that the debtor should go to the wall at once remember that the wolf may be at his own door when help and time may be all that stands between him and ruin. Surely our laws have ample provisions for the collection of debts. Why, then, shall Government provide also for breaking debtors up in advance of collection? Why step in with a measure of specie payment which adds thirty per cent. to the amount of all dues, and crushes down the debtor, diminishes his means of payment, lessens his resources, cramps his movements, and extinguishes his last hope of solvency?

The provision authorizing gold contracts could not be enforced for twelve months; financial ruin would follow in the wake of the experiment, and the nation find itself further than ever from a solvent condition. Whenever a political economist can be found who can prove that an excessive demand causes an excessive supply and cheapens the article, we may expect this plan of resumption with the help of gold contracts to succeed, but not till then. Enforce gold contracts, and the legal-tender qualities of greenbacks have disappeared in effect. Our paper circulation may be considered as retired to the amount of that species of currency. The most probable effect would be to put under ban our whole volume of paper money.

The project of coming back to specie payment without increasing existing indebtedness, by authorizing a compliance with contracts which are payable in money to be settled at their present value in gold, at first glance seems plausible and fair. It would seem but reasonable that a debt contracted when currency was worth but seventy-five cents to the dollar in gold should be paid off at the same rate in gold: thus, that a debt of $100 should be paid off by seventy-five dollars in gold. The effect of this, it is urged, would be to restore specie to circulation, though taken at a premium.

It is doubtful whether such a measure would have the desired effect; for what debtor who had the paper money wherewith to pay his debt would trouble himself to get the gold if it were left optional with him to do so? And if he were compelled to purchase gold to discharge his debt would not this compulsion tend to raise the price of gold by increasing the demand? Would not contracts be made payable in gold at such a premium to a large amount, and the very evil attempted to be avoided only be increased and intensified? It would seem that a direct effect of the making of such contracts would be to gradually widen the chasm between paper and specie, by making the latter a preferred currency. Already it is preferred for duties on imports and interest on the public debt to the amount of nearly three hundred millions a year, and if to this class is to be added a large number of private contracts, even though gold is taken at a premium, we can look for nothing but its enhancement in value. The true policy would seem to be to discriminate as rarely as possible between the two kinds of currency, so that at last people might not come to prefer one to another. But once let it enter into all private contracts that gold is to be paid at a premium, and enforce it by the judgment of our courts and execution, and the brand is fastened ineffaceably upon the paper currency; its fate is sealed, the day of redemption is indefinitely postponed, the distinction between it and specie becomes established and interwoven into business, and the difficulty becomes inextricable.

Had the policy been adopted of paying the interest of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks, as was proposed, we should have been long since much nearer specie payment than we are at present. But the preference was given to coin, creating a constant demand for a large amount, and we are now suffering from the bad effects of a system which the measure we are discussing is only calculated to aggravate. One of the evils to be dreaded in a return to specie payment, by debtors in the appreciation of their indebtedness, would, in a great measure be avoided by permission to settle at a premium in specie, but the attendant evil of the permanent establishment of the discredit of paper money—the very thing sought to be remedied—would overbalance any good that might result to individuals. Specie would not become a part of the currency; its price would go up; paper would be dishonored; speculations in gold would go on; debtors would be compelled to get it at a sacrifice and at any cost, or be driven to the wall by execution; all new contracts would necessarily recognize the difference between specie and paper. The system once begun must be continued, and while old debtors could move on much more nearly upon their old basis than in case of a complete restoration of specie payment the effect upon new transactions would be almost the same as if contracts payable in specie were directly authorized, which we have already seen is a tremendous measure of contraction, accompanied by a rise in the value of specie, by a large virtual increase of indebtedness, and by the possible bankruptcy of the debtor class.

Diametrically opposed to all these shifting and temporary expedients to gain a brief holiday of credit stands the great measure of funding the public debt upon a long time at a low rate of interest—a measure that will relieve the enormous annual drain of gold for interest a third or fourth; that will give time for the establishment of confidence in our integrity and ability; that will give time for the growth of the nation, so that when the debt falls due we can with ease pay it off. To return to specie payment before funding the debt at a lower than the present rate of interest will render that measure an impossibility. Who that holds a six per cent. bond, which is as good as gold, will surrender or exchange it for one which is no better and brings but four per cent., while, on the contrary, he who holds a six per cent. bond payable in greenbacks might willingly surrender it for a four per cent., payable in gold? Specie payment and a funding bill are the antipodes, and by what game of legerdemain the politician thinks he can advocate both—can ride both hobbies, going in opposite directions, at the same time—I am at a loss to see. If I were a candidate for national honors, and expected to obtain by humbug the support of the laboring poor who want constant employment, ready pay, and active business, I would whisper in the ear of the bondholder my support of a return to specie payment by compulsory measures in tones so low that the laborer would never hear it. I would not dare to come upon the floor of Congress and blow hot and cold at the same breath and expect nobody to find it out. I would not dare to come here and say I was in favor of a system to reduce the annual interest thirty, forty, or fifty millions, and at the same time advocate measures which would make the bondholder grasp his contract with greater vigor and read practically upon its face that it was payable in gold. But if I were not in favor of reducing the interest; if I wished to keep up the annual stream of $126,000,000 of gold from the Treasury; if I thought a funding bill unwise; if I believed the contract in the five-twenty bond called for gold, both for principal and interest, then I would advocate in all earnestness a return to specie payments if such a thing were otherwise practicable or possible, or within a remote range of possibility.

But some one will say: "Suppose we have come to specie payment? Then we can fund our debt by issuing a bond which the commercial world will take at par with a low rate of interest." Would such a thing be possible while more than sixteen hundred million of five-twenty bonds stood in the way? Is it to be supposed that these bonds will go above par? Can we by magic put our credit, which now lags twenty-five per cent. behind, at once, or in a few short months, at such a premium as that a four per cent. bond will be at par? How else can you take six per cents. with four per cents.? Or do gentlemen propose to go into the market and again hawk about our promises at a discount, and thus save the people's money?

That the funding of our debt at a lower rate of interest is desirable can hardly be seriously questioned. There are but two other alternatives beside repudiation, and these are its gradual extinguishment or its continuance at its present volume, with a regular payment of six per cent. interest in each case. No one thinks seriously of repudiation. No one thinks seriously of issuing greenbacks for the whole of the debt, thereby saving interest. Very few are so confident in the ability and willingness of the people to pay heavy taxes as to desire now to increase them in order to pay off the debt, while a larger number are satisfied with a continuance of the debt, drawing its present interest, and leaving its adjustment to some future contingency. But by far the greater portion of the people feel that now is the time to fix upon a permanent basis the great subjects of the debt and the currency, dependent as both are, after all, on their capability to meet the demands of the tax-gatherer; for, place this matter where you will, it all inevitably comes back for its basis upon the will and ability of the people to supply the revenues. The interest-bearing debt once adjusted permanently, its payment put off, its interest reduced, its ultimate security made good by thirty or forty years of national growth and progress, and the question of paying specie for greenbacks will be but a trivial one. When the $1,600,000,000 are laid quietly away the $350,000,000 can easily be handled.

Suppose an individual having a large landed estate and no ready money to owe $10,000, for which he had given his notes, some without interest, the most of them with interest; some payable in produce, some in cash, some at no definite time; the bulk of the debt, $8,000, being payable in produce, the interest alone payable in cash. He cannot pay at present; his property is rising in value; all he really needs is time. His creditor, who wants money for his debt, and not produce, will give him an extension at a lower rate of interest if the whole will be made payable in cash. What is the debtor's policy? Surely it is to get time to gain the rise in value of his property, to make the arrangement to let his creditor feel that he is safe and will get cash when it falls due. Both are interested in such a settlement, and both will be satisfied in making it. This done, the small unadjusted balance not bearing interest can soon be disposed of and paid off, or made as good as gold.

The great burden by the funding arrangement has been lifted, the small one will give no trouble. The creditor who was annoyed at the thought of getting eight out of ten thousand dollars in produce, now that he has the promise of money, is well pleased; and the debtor, with the liberty of action which a long extension gives, goes to work cheerfully and builds up his fortune, accumulates, prospers, and inspires faith in his ability to pay. Suppose the debtor while he had no money would declare he would pay cash, who would believe him? Surely not the creditor. Surely not the shrewd man of business. Credit has never yet been obtained by empty boasts or rash promises, but by provident forethought, by hard work, by sterling, straight-forward honesty, and practical common sense.

Among other reasons to be given in favor of funding our debt at a lower rate is the one that by this means a greater portion of it may be taken in foreign countries, leaving all of our means to be employed in legitimate business at home, thus giving an impulse to that healthy national growth which alone can restore our credit completely. The value of money in this country is greater than six per cent.; as a rule it is loaned at higher rates. Millions can be borrowed in Europe at a lower rate. Why should it not be done? Is it not better that our people should use their means in improving and building up our own possessions and developing our own resources than to be engaged in loaning their money to the Government, sitting idly with folded hands? We can use our own means to better advantage than in mere money lending, and can do no better than borrow every dollar of the public debt from the Old World at three to four per cent. No greater calamity could befall us than to become a nation of money-lenders.

The active employment of our capital at home will return us again to specie payment. A return effected by the revival of business, the extension of trade, the development of the mineral, manufacturing, and agricultural resources of the country, the increase of population, the completion of great public works—in fine, by the growth in power and wealth of the nation.

This is the broad road to resumption which the people can and will travel, slowly it may be, but surely and safely. It may be the work of years, but once restored nothing again except the overthrow of the Government can shake it. In the ten years preceding the war the values of all property had more than doubled in the United States.

The following statement, condensed from the report of Commissioner Wells, very recently made, shows some of the elements of our national growth since the war:

"From the 1st of July, 1865, to the 1st of December, 1886, about one million natives of foreign countries have sought a permanent home in the United States. Investigations made some years ago (since which the character of the immigration has greatly improved) showed that these immigrants bring with them specie or its equivalent to the average amount of eighty dollars per head; while their average value to the country as producers cannot be estimated at less than half the average value of an ordinary laborer in the South prior to the war, namely, $1,000 each. Immigration, then, since the termination of the war may be regarded as having added $80,000,000 directly, and $500,000,000 indirectly, to the wealth and resources of the country. In referring to the general increase in the products of domestic industry he asserts that all the available data tend to establish the following conclusions, namely, that within the last five years more cotton spindles have been put in operation, more iron furnaces erected, more iron smelted, more bars rolled, more steel made, more coal and copper mined, more lumber sawed and hewn, more houses and shops constructed, more manufactures of different kinds started, and more petroleum collected, refined, and exported, than during any equal period in the history of the country; and that this increase has been greater both as regards quality and quantity, and greater than the legitimate increase to be expected from the normal increase of wealth and population.

"The following figures are given: number of cotton spindles in 1860, 5,235,727; in 1867, 7,000,000—a gain of 31.78 per cent. in from four to five years, and mainly since the termination of the war.

"Number of woollen manufacturing establishments in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota in 1860, 269, with a capital of $1,616,740; in 1868, 557, with a capital of $5,438,000.

"The recent average annual increase in the production of pig iron is remarkably uniform and greatly in excess of the ratio of increase of population. For the seven years from 1860 (when the production was 913,770 tons) to 1867, the average annual increase has been 8.35 per cent.

"The product of the copper mines of Lake Superior in 1860 was 6,000 tons, and in 1867, 11,735 tons.

"In 1862 the export of petroleum was returned at 10,887,701 gallons. During the years 1864 and 1865, with the advantage of a high premium on gold, the export increased to an average of about 39,000,000 gallons. In 1867 the export was 67,052,020 gallons, and for 1868 the export to December 18 is returned at 94,774,291 gallons.

"The recent increase in the production of anthracite coal, which may be taken as a measure of the product of all American coal, is reported as follows: 1862, 7,499,550 tons; 1866, 12,379,490 tons; 1867, 12,650,571 tons; 1868, to December 12, 13,500,000 tons.

"The aggregate crops of the northern States for 1867 were believed to be greater than those of any previous year, while the crops for the past year are known to exceed in quantity and quality those of 1867.

"The present ratio of the increase of the crop of Indian corn for the whole country is put by the best authorities at an average of three and one half per cent. per annum. The crop of 1860 was returned by the census at 830,451,707 bushels, and adopting the above ratio of increase, the crop of 1868, acknowledged to be a full one, must be estimated at 1,100,000,000 bushels, and if sold at the assumed low average of forty-six cents per bushel, would net over $500,000,000.

"The following are the estimated cotton crops of the South since the termination of the war: 1865-66, 2,154,476 bales; 1866-67, 1,954,993 bales; 1867-68, 2,438,865 bales; 1868-69, estimated 12,700,000 bales.

"The culture of rice at the South, which at the termination of the war practically amounted to nothing, has also so far been restored that the product of the present year is estimated at seventy thousand tierces, an amount probably sufficient for home consumption, and giving certain promise of a speedy renewal of the former extensive exports of this article.

"The following is an estimate of the tobacco crops of the United States since 1850, prepared by a committee of the trade for the use of the Committee of Ways and Means at the first session of the Fortieth Congress:

As illustrating the comparative progress of our own country with that of England and France, I take the liberty to refer to the following tables prepared by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] in his argument in favor of the Northern Pacific railroad. To show the increase directly due to railroads in the values of the country, permit me to read a short extract from the recent speech of General Walbridge, made in Cincinnati:

"In a period of seventeen years the mileage of our railways had increased nearly four hundred per cent., their tonnage one thousand per cent., with a corresponding increase of value. The population of the country in the meantime had increased from twenty-four to thirty-six millions, or at the rate of fifty per cent. In other words, the increase of the commerce of the country borne upon railroads has been two thousand-fold greater to that of our population. In 1851 the freight moved upon all the railroads equaled four hundred and seventy-seven pounds per head of population. Its value equaled say thirty-one dollars per head. In 1853 the tonnage equaled two thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven pounds per head, having a value of $210 per head. The increase of the tonnage of railroads for the period named has been wholly a creation of these works, as there has at the same time been a very large increase of merchandise moved upon the water-courses of the country."

"In 1851 the cost of the ten thousand miles of railroad then in operation in the United States equaled $30,000,000. In 1853 the cost of the thirty-nine thousand miles equaled $1,600,000,000. The investment since 1851 of $1,600,000,000 consequently has been the means of an annual circulation of a commerce having a value fivefold greater, or $5,750,000,000. Every dollar invested in our railroads is the direct means of creating annually five times the amount, so marvellously potent are the new agencies that science, within the memory of man, has brought to the aid of man. In their use we have at last hit upon the method of nature, or Providence, and enjoy in some degree his infinite attributes in wielding for our own use the laws that uphold and control the material world."

"The results achieved in a single State will be found, on examination, to be quite as striking as is the aggregate for the whole nation. There were in the State of Illinois in 1851 two hundred and fifty miles of railway, two cost of which was about seven million five hundred thousand dollars. The tonnage of these roads, only just opened, could not have exceeded one hundred thousand tons, having a value say of $15,000,000. At the close of 1857 there were three thousand two hundred and fifty miles of railroad in operation in the State, having a tonnage traffic of at least five million tons, possessing a value of at least $750,000,000. The cost of the roads equaled $130,000,000. The value of the commerce transported over them in one year equaled very nearly six times their cost. In 1851 the number of pounds of merchandise transported by these roads equaled about two hundred pounds per head of population."

"In 1857 the tonnage transported exceeded four thousand pounds, or two tons per head. The value of the tonnage per head in 1851 was about fifteen dollars; in 1857 it was equal to $330 per head. This unexampled increase was wholly due to the construction of railroads, as there has in the meantime been a very large increase in the tonnage on the water-courses of the State. It will be borne in mind that the tonnage of railroads of this State consists almost entirely of the products of agriculture which will bear transportation for only a comparatively small distance over ordinary roads. These products are now forwarded, on an average, two hundred miles before reaching a market."

"The population of Illinois now makes one fifteenth of that of the whole country. It now defrays one fifteenth of the whole burdens of the General Government. Its proportion of the Federal taxes equals $24,000,000 annually. Its ability to pay this vast sum is almost entirely due to the railroads that have been constructed within it during the past fifteen years."

Grand as this progress is, a greater growth is before us. Europe is sending us her hardy and industrious sons, with their trained hands and heads, to assist us in the work of development. Since the war our own young men seem inspired with greater hope and vigor. They are no longer found idling their days away in small towns, or listlessly strolling from place to place seeking amusement. The game of marbles and quoits, even at Bascom's grocery, is becoming obsolete. The young men are at work, cheerfully and earnestly. The railroad enterprises of the land are being pushed on with increased vigor. Through routes and great trunk lines will not suffice. Every village must now have its iron track; and East, West, North and South the iron horse is finding his way up and down all the valleys, over the hills, under the mountains, wherever the farmer, the mechanic, the miner or the merchant can find profitable freights to draw. The great corporations are putting out their feelers in every direction, and at no time have these enterprises commanded so much attention or added so much to values. The Pacific road is being pushed on with unparalleled speed. This year will see its completion—the grandest work of all the ages and races of man, destined to add value untold to our territories by their settlement, by the opening of the mines, and by the increase of business; destined to change the great currents of commerce from China and the Indies, and make them tributary to us; destined to make our great seaports the centers of the world's trade, and to give to New York and San Francisco that comparative importance once held by the great ports of the Levant, Venice, Genoa, Marseilles, and afterward by the cities of Holland and the Hanse towns, and more recently by London, Liverpool, Havre, and Glasgow. The great silver and gold lodes of our western mountains will be traversed by this thoroughfare. Where we now get ninety millions a year of precious metal we will get three hundred.

We have but just begun their development. The hardy miner with his pick upon his shoulder, driving his ox team over plain and mountain, desert and river, more than a thousand miles, hauls his quartz-mill and his supplies and tears the glittering treasures from nature's great store-house in her remotest solitudes, unbroken before by the voice of civilization. When the railway train can take tools, machinery, and supplies in and ores out; when miners and farmers, merchants and manufacturers, can pour into those rich regions as they now through the highways of our central States, it is but reasonable to suppose that the gold product will be more than quadrupled.

Let him who is eager for specie payment look in this direction for it, rather than into the formal enactments of the statute-book. Here it is no dream. Here it will be a grand reality. The southern States are to be developed by free labor, and the national growth in this direction must be vast. Slavery having impeded progress there, where the advantages of climate and production are unequalled in our country, cotton will aid to turn the tide of foreign gold in our favor. Tobacco, sugar, hemp, rice, as well as wheat, corn, cattle, and hogs, the thousand products of the field, orchard, vineyard, pasture, and plantation, are yet to crowd the markets of the South, where industrious hands guided by intelligent heads, inspired by the fruits of free exertion, find the amplest rewards. To-day that region furnishes a more inviting field to the immigrant than any portion of the Union. Soil, water, timber, minerals, overhung by the sky of Italy and favored by the most delightful climate, tempt mankind to enter and possess them. Here is growth; here is gold; here is specie payment by divine right. When that region supplies itself with breadstuffs and meat, with wool, cattle, horses, and mules, and yields a surplus to be added to the great staples of export now made, as it can and surely will, we may expect substantial help in paying off our debt and appreciating our currency.

This vast development, East and West, North, center, and South, is in the immediate future. Thirty years of prosperous national life will see us with double our present population and treble our wealth. With such an increase, such sure coming prosperity, why should we burden ourselves with the payment of a debt which posterity can discharge without an effort? Why should we waste our strength in ineffectual struggles to give present value and currency to our promises which are well secured, and which long before they fall due will be worth their face in gold? Let us make haste slowly. The world will find out our stability and strength, and give to us in greater measure than to venerable monarchies that slow growing confidence which we deserve.

Adopt such a policy as that, the demand for the precious metals will be diminished, while the supply is increased and the way to specie payment is open. Authorize no such contracts payable in gold, either at their face or at a premium, or in any shape whatever, for either measure will vastly augment the demand. Cut down, by the passage of a funding bill, the rate of interest, and thus diminish the demand. Cut off all imports of luxuries possible, diminishing the drain still further. On the other hand, develop the country—open every avenue of improvement. Unlock the vast mites of the West and pour out their treasures. Encourage our manufacturing interests. Foster foreign trade; send abroad our cotton and whatever we may have to sell, and turn the tides of commerce in our favor. Enable the people to pay their taxes by a liberal policy; do not cramp them by contraction in any form. Expand the currency to meet the reasonable wants of community. By all these means increase their individual wealth and ability to pay debts, and the country will rise in credit and power with them, and it never will without them. Having thus increased the supply of gold we can talk rationally about resumption. This is the gradual and easy method which increases the power to pay without increasing indebtedness and without destroying the prices of labor and property, and, instead of cutting down paper to a gold standard, elevates and enhances it till it becomes its equal.

In the primal days of Earth it is said that a wide waste of waters slumbered upon the whole face of the globe; but the day came when the convulsions of nature broke the vast strata of rocks that underlay the ocean and heaved islands and continents toward the surface. At first, the summits of the mountains peered through the waves, and gradually, in slow years, the great plains, dripping and oozy, were lifted, inch by inch, to the sun. And then Morning came and sang her song, and purple Evening followed with her golden light, and Spring came with her violets and green, and Autumn came with her grapes and ripe corn. And after this, Man came with his immortal soul; then God came with his blessing on all. So began life on earth.

So shall our nation be lifted from the bitter ocean of civil war, so shall the mighty upheaval progress. Slowly as the approach of a continent to the sun our national credit is rising, solid as the mountains, enduring as the plains; its coast defying the waters of treason; its eternal rocks bearing up a happy people. Slowly and grandly rising, the whole nation comes up together, a unit in credit as it is a unit in power.

RECOGNITION OF CRETE.

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Chairman, on the 7th of last month, immediately upon the reassembling of the House at this session, I had the honor to introduce the following preamble and joint resolution, which it is my purpose to-day to maintain:

Whereas the American people have on many occasions expressed and at all times feel a sympathy with the progress of liberty and Christian civilization among the people of the East; and whereas the people of Crete have successfully sustained their independence, having organized and maintained a provisional government, which, encouraged by and consequent upon the support given to the cause of Crete by the American people, has accredited a diplomatic agent in the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the duty of the Government of the United States to acknowledge the existence of the provisional government of Crete as an independent political State, and to treat with it as such.

I do not rise to defend the provisional government of Crete, but to vindicate its cause and demand its rights.

Mr. Chairman, in venturing to urge upon this House the formal recognition of the provisional Christian government of Crete as an independent political State I derive encouragement from the respectful manner in which the memorial of the Cretan Government addressed last year to the Speaker of this House, and to the President of the Senate, has been received by this and the other branch of the Legislature, and ordered by unanimous consent to be published in the Globe and to be referred to the respective Committees on Foreign Relations. The application of the provisional government of Crete having thus become a matter of legislative deliberation on the part of the American Congress, that Government was taught to look forward hopefully to this Republic for the recognition of its independence, inasmuch as by our acceptance of its memorial we admitted the fact that it had the right to address us as the provisional government of Crete, our liberality in this respect presenting a characteristic contrast to the narrow spirit evinced by the late English Conservative administration, which declined to accept a communication from the provisional government of Crete in the fear of thereby impairing its good relations with the pretenders to the Cretans' country. I use this expression "pretender" advisedly, because the Cretans having, together with Greece, won their independence in 1827, enjoyed it for three long years as fully as did the Hellenic kingdom.

In 1830 England, in connivance with other Powers, committed the wrong of bartering Crete to Egypt, by whom it was afterward sold to the Moslem, the Cretan people protesting all the time against this violation of their national rights and the usurpation of an alien anti-Christian race whose domination they had terminated in 1827 by force of arms. Not only the Cretans but eminent statesmen, Lord Palmerston among the number, protested against the usurpation of Egyptian and Ottoman power in Crete. Nay, more; when the throne of Greece was offered to Leopold, of Belgium, this wise and moderate prince declined accepting it unless Crete should be restored to her national independence as part of Greece, thus confirming my assertion that the Moslems who were permitted to usurp power over the Cretans can only be regarded in the light of "pretenders," and that the provisional Cretan Christian government is the only lawful government of that island, and as such entitled to the recognition of the United States.

I derive further encouragement in urging this measure upon the attention of the House from the unanimous spirit in which resolutions in behalf of the Cretans have been at various times adopted, not only separately in this, but also conjointly with the other branch of Congress, and from the firm tone of conviction in which this same act of international justice has been urged upon you by the Legislature of the State of Maine and by many influential organs of public opinion, as well as by eminent citizens of the United States.

It has been stated that Crete is not worthy our attention because it is small. I do not for one moment suppose that you will make the application of justice contingent upon the size of the State that solicits it. Crete was, as a part of the ancient Hellenic government, and again from 1827 to 1830, as solid a part of Greece as Rhode Island and Delaware are parts of the United States. Would you allow the rights of Rhode Island and Delaware to be trampled upon because they are small States? And yet Crete is larger than both of these States, and in fact the largest and once the most populous and commercial island of the Mediterranean, with a population reduced now by Turkish massacres and oppressions to half a million, but capable under the auspices of national independence to swell up to several millions, as it was anciently. If, however, there is anything in this arithmetical argument it militates in favor of protection and recognition. The smaller a State the more it is exposed to the designs of its more powerful enemies and the more it needs the solicitude of the friends of liberty.

Next, it is stated that because we opposed the recognition of the slave confederacy and the Mexican empire we thereby debar ourselves from recognizing the Cretan provisional government, as if recognition in the interest of liberty was not as much an international duty on the part of the American Republic as recognition in the interest of slavery is an international crime. Is it so soon forgotten that the late American contest was to disrupt the unity of this great free Government in the interest of slavery and oppression, while the present war in Crete is to restore an ancient union and liberty borne down again and again by the oppressors with whom they now contend? Nay, it is ignored that the Powers that upheld the slaveholder's rebellion in the South and the imperialistic usurpation in Mexico are the same to uphold the bondage of the Cretans and the Moslem usurpation. They are the same who now wish to expunge America from the rank of Christian nations, by making you believe that they, and they alone—they who conspired against our own and our sister republic, are the anointed guardians of Christendom, and that we, the American people, who act out the truth of Christianity, in our humane and mankind-elevating institutions on a more comprehensive scale than all the monarchies of the world together—must not throw our international influence in the scale of Cretan independence. For observe that the so-called great Powers interfere in the Orient not so much as European but as Christian Powers. For us to withhold our recognition from the Cretans would be to admit that Christianity is monopolized by the despots of Europe and Asia, and that we have no share in its protection.

As a Representative of the American people, humbly as I may feel as an individual, I here denounce this presumption of European and Asiatic monarchs to arrogate to themselves the sole right of protection of the Christians in the East, nor can they ask us to respect the treaties which they make among themselves without our consent or that of those they thus enslave.

Bear in mind that, whatever may be said of our traditional policy in regard to our non-intervention in the affairs of foreign nations, it has no reference whatever to the Orient, which is as hallowed to us as it is to monarchs by its high sacred and secular associations, and which consequently occupies an exceptional ground, where our influence as the greatest Christian Republic on earth should be paramount over that of all the so-called Christian monarchies. Yet I know that whenever we are anxious to recognize a European State in the interest of liberty these monarchists taunt us with what they are pleased to call our Monroe doctrine, and some of our own people indorse the fallacy. No greater fallacy than this ever existed. Our Monroe doctrine, or, properly speaking, our doctrine of non-intervention on American soil, is not well understood. Our Monroe doctrine impels us to prevent the establishment of alien monarchies on the American continent; this and no more. If we were to exert ourselves in favor of the establishment by force of American republics on the European continent, then, and only then, would we be amenable to the censure of attempting to do in Europe what we deprecate in America. But whenever any people of their own will create, alter, or change their Government untrammelled or controlled by outside selfish influences it becomes the duty of all nations to recognize its independence. This great privilege of every people we declare to be a fundamental right, and we must not ourselves violate it. It is immaterial on which continent the people reside, whether it be a new government or the gathering of the fragments of one rent by internal or external troubles. And though it might be said that our republican action is conducive to the progress of mankind, while monarchical influence in America is detrimental to it, I will not pursue this line of argument on the present occasion, to which it does not apply, but content myself with dismissing the Monroe doctrine fallacy in the conclusive manner in which I have disposed of it. It was not contrary to the Monroe doctrine for European Powers to recognize the Governments of South and Central America. Why should we not have the same right of recognizing provisional governments in Europe which they have in recognizing provisional governments in America?

I contend that the provisional government of Crete is more firmly rooted in the affections of the Cretan people than is the case with other provisional governments recently recognized by the American Government. I contend that they are more fully in possession of their country than were the American Colonies of theirs when they were recognized by Holland. The provisional government of Crete, in 1866, divided the island into twenty-four districts, each district reporting through a committee to the central government, which is elected by the general national assembly, which in its turn is elected by the people. Crete is to-day a republic. The Turks hold only a few forts and block-houses, from which they cannot sally forth in array of battle, and in which they are virtually prisoners. Omer Pasha, the Turkish Haynau, an Austrian by birth and a Moslem by conversion, was sent to Crete to destroy the provisional government. His prowess consisted in outraging women and massacring defenseless old men and children, and he returned to his master acknowledging that he who was sent to defeat was himself defeated, at a loss to Turkey of fifty thousand men and 100,000,000*f*. Then the Moslem usurper, in his despair, sent the greatest man of his council, namely, Ali Pasha, the grand vizier, to reconcile the Cretans to Moslem usurpation. This personage was shut up for many months in a little fortress in Crete, trembling for his own life, and eventually returned, telling his master that the Cretans were afflicted by the Hellenic infirmity of a spirit of nationality and independence.

After the ignominious defeat of the butcher Omer and the diplomat Ali Pasha, the Cretans had every reason to hope that usurpation would relax in its grasp, but since all means of warfare and diplomacy had failed to reconcile Crete, massacres were perpetrated the cruelty of which is without parallel even in the annals of the Apaches. Since the uphold-ers of the Moslem usurpers were afraid that these massacres would rouse the indignation of all civilized nations, many efforts were made to subsidize and corrupt public opinion, so as to throw doubts upon their occurrence. A culmination of these efforts may be found in the elaborate misrepresentations distributed in an anonymous pamphlet to the members of Congress that we found upon our desks when we met after the recess, and to which no man in this afternoon of the nineteenth century of the Christian era in this fair, free land had the hardihood to affix his name or character. The Christian authorities instituted the most rigid inquiries, and caused the official statistics of these massacres to be published, taking care to authenticate every fact by evidence and by the specification of the names of the victims and the localities in which the outrages were committed upon them. One of the principal witnesses of these bloody acts was the French representative in Crete, whose testimony reflects the greatest credit upon his sense of humanity.

Mr. Chairman, the memorial of the provisional government presented last year to this House, in which it solicits the recognition of the United States, contains an official statement of these massacres. I hold it now in my hand, and make it in its condensed form a part of my remarks:

The same barbarisms have been practiced since. A more heartrending statement of atrocities has never before been submitted to the American Congress: women of all ages violated, tortured, massacred; old men, including many members of the Greek Church, murdered and their corpses thrown to the dogs; Christian churches defiled by the most beastly orgies; the property of Crete ruthlessly destroyed. Mr. Chairman, the usurper of Crete, by these massacres and outrages, placed himself outside the pale of civilization. All authorities on international law agree in outlawing a monster guilty of such atrocities. Even the upholders of the usurper were not indifferent to these fearful crimes against humanity and against womanhood. They actually gave aid and comfort to the Cretans by allowing their ships to give a free passage to the Cretan women and non-combatants to Greece. More than sixty thousand women, children, and old men left the island and went to Greece, and remain there now awaiting the result.

As the sequel shows, they were only afraid that a continuation of these massacres would cause a universal revolt against the Moslem usurper, and thereby injure their material interests in the Levant. Hence their anxiety to remove the women and children from Crete. The less there remain of women in Crete the less will there be opportunity for the gratification of Moslem lust and barbarism, and the less to awaken the disgust of the civilized world. Nay, it was hoped by the Powers interested in upholding the Moslem usurper, that by promoting the exodus of the non-combatants, and by winking at the annihilation of the able-bodied population, the Cretan question would be solved by the death of the Cretans, and the material interests of these anointed guardians of Christendom thus be relieved from the question altogether. But lo! the Cretan warriors had not sooner ceased to be embarrassed by the necessity of protecting their wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters against the outrages of the Moslem soldiery, the women had not sooner departed for the Greek continent, than their resistance to the usurper became more indomitable than it ever was before. When the Powers who uphold the Moslem, as they upheld the slave oligarchy and the Mexican usurpation, became aware of this they grew wrathful. In connivance with the Moslem, public opinion was again everywhere misled; a thousand hired pens, and only recently false cable dispatches, were so busy in disseminating the falsehood that the Cretan insurrection was at an end that when truth and justice loving men came forward to plead in favor of the recognition of the provisional government they were overwhelmed with sarcasm and abuse. But all of a sudden this fabric of vilification fell miserably to the ground. The provisional Christian Cretan government was so firmly established and administered so efficaciously, the Moslem usurpers had become so utterly powerless to overthrow it, that goaded on by a spirit of revenge, and with the blood of their Cretan massacres still upon their garments, they sound the bugle of war, threatening to perpetrate the same outrages in Greece which they have committed in Crete. Failing in his attempt to murder the liberty of Crete, the usurper menaces to throttle that of the Cretan compatriots, the Hellenes. And at this time the Enosis, a Greek vessel that carried supplies to this starving people in Crete, is blockaded within the port of Syra by a Turkish fleet, commanded by Hobart Pasha, who, stripped of his Turkish title, is Captain Hobart, an English blockade runner in our late struggle. This bullying policy of the usurper confirms, if possible, my determination to procure the recognition by the United States of the people who have so heroically resisted his aggressions.

I have shown that the Moslem is only a pretender, a usurper in Crete. Crete became free and independent from him in 1827, and maintained its freedom until 1830. That Egyptian and Moslem rule was then imposed upon Crete contrary to the wishes of the people, and under their continued protest, does not in any degree impair the right to independence which Crete had acquired prior to 1830. On the contrary, it invests the struggle in which the island was engaged since that time, and particularly within the last three years, with all the sanction of lawfulness. The Cretans are therefore not to be regarded as "insurgents" shaking off the rule of a lawful sovereign, but in every sense as a free people, exerting its lawful right to overthrow an unlawful usurpation.

But even if there are Americans who hold that treaties made between A, B, and C for the purpose of arbitrarily disposing of the destinies of D; if there are Anglo-American publicists ever ready to take English views and to make the American people believe that A, B, C, England, France, and Austria, had the right arbitrarily to sell D (Crete) to Egypt or to Turkey, I do not think that my fair-minded fellow-countrymen will approve of this "London Times" theory, and even those who should uphold this cannot but remember that the United States was no party to those infamous transactions which bartered away the liberty of a free people, and that consequently these foul treaties cannot stand in the way, even if they had not been conceived in a spirit of iniquity, of the recognition of the independence of Crete so far as our Government is concerned. We are admonished that we must not dare to interfere in behalf of the Hellenic race in its contest with an Asiatic Mormon dynasty of Moslem, but the persons who hold this language are not precisely the men to dictate to the American people what particular policy they shall pursue. We are told that Mahomet had as good a right to found a religion as Jesus Christ; that Mohammedanism has as good a right to direct civilization as Christianity has, and that the polygamy which it allows is as conducive to the protection of woman's rights, and the promotion of woman's dignity and prosperity, as the law and sanctity of marriage prescribed by our Saviour. Some persons may hold peculiar views on this subject. Fortunately, their views are not those of the American people.

From my place in the House I call the attention of the American people to the fact that they pay tribute now to the more than criminal stupidity and barbarism of the Turks, who will not listen to the teachings of civilization when presented to them. Turn to the diplomatic appropriation bill passed in this House on yesterday, and read that we appropriate money to pay for courts, guards, marshals, prisons, and prison-keepers for American citizens and convicts, neither of whom can be safely intrusted to the custody of these people. American citizens need no such protection under Christian Governments—a further and conclusive proof that Christendom does not confide to the Mussulman a perfect nationality, but holds him as an encamper in the country he has usurped. Christendom pays these tributes rather than trust their people in the Moslem's hands. Yet while Christian nations will not trust their citizens in the Moslem's power, they stand cool lookers-on to his murder and dishonor of a people whose civilization and faith are as theirs; whose devotion to country and kind are as pure, and whose bravery and patriotism have done them honor before the world.

Mr. Chairman, this strange people who, from the time of the foundation of their religion by Mahomet in the sixth century to this hour, have hated progress; and who, though in constant and immediate contact with the most enlightened part of the Christian world for centuries have made no progress either in arts or morals; who tear down, but build not up; who by mere brute force overawe the Orient and hold it now by a spurious tenure, and are permitted to do so through selfish diplomacy, which secures the trade of the Levant to those who assume to grant the privilege, and drives out all others, who suffer it simply because it has been heretofore done. My opinion is, that the power, the usurpations, and the impositions of the Mussulman are near their end. Soon may it be written Mahomet and Abdul Aziz—Alpha and Omega—the first and last of Moslem rule. The merchant and the navigator, the student and the statesman, the mechanic and the laborer, the free man and the Christian everywhere throughout the civilized world, thankful that those places hallowed to learning and religion are relieved from that sea of night, will say with one accord, all hail to the great Republic, that star of the West which gilds the eastern sky with light and life and hope!

Fortunately, we have American missionaries in the East, Dr. Hamlin at their head, who, in the midst of Turkish polygamy and barbarism, diffuse the teachings of Christ and the blessings of Christian education. But the question about our intervention for the sake of Greece has been altogether mistaken. The question is not to organize a crusade against the Mohammedan religion and against Turkish polygamy; or whether an Asiatic encampment of Turks in Europe, addicted to that anti-Christian faith and that anti-Christian practice, shall be allowed to rule despotically over Christian nations who are as much its superior as the American is superior to the aboriginal Indian. But this question may be said not to belong to our legislative jurisdiction; though as a great Christian people we have clearly the right, and, indeed, it is our sacred duty, to place the seal of our reprobation upon such a gross outrage upon civilization, upon such a terrible crime against Christianity and humanity.

But for all that, this is not the question which we are called upon to determine. The gist of the question is this: whether a people that conquered its freedom, which after this had been treacherously stolen from it, reconquered its independence with a heroism worthy of the days of Marathon and Missolonghi, and is in full possession of self-government and asks us to recognize its independence—whether this people, the Cretan people, is not entitled to this recognition on the part of the United States? I say it is, and I wish you to declare so formally without fear of the frowns of the Mormon sultan or of the French emperor or of the conquerors of Hindostan. I ask you to settle this question upon its own merits, as I have explained them, without regard to what is called the European balance of power and the Eastern question, with which we have nothing to do. All we, the American people, have to deal with is another people that struggled for its old liberty against formidable odds, and that having successfully established a provisional government of its own choice is entitled to our recognition. Indeed, we cannot withhold it without justly incurring the reproach of depriving other struggling nations of that moral and political support which was accorded to us, and which we accepted so gratefully at the time when our now powerful nation was in the throes of its creation. For us as a great people to say, as some money-market publicists prompt us to say, "We have enough business on hand in paying our debt and attending to our own jobs," would be the height of meanness and injustice, and indeed place us in the same humiliating category with the Anglo-Saxon islanders, whose creed has always been that of the same unmitigated pagan selfishness which is now commended to our emulation. No, Mr. Chairman, if we cannot get rid, even in these days of the Celtic and Teutonic preponderance of blood in the American masses, of the mythological reminiscence of the mother country, let us at all events shun the selfishness of this our hypothetical mother; let us emulate and let the Greeks, too, emulate her genius of self-aggrandizement; but let us not imitate that selfishness which, whenever another people throws off the shackles of despotism and calls for recognition of its independence, repeats in fine plausible diplomatic and business-like phrases the murderous cry of Cain: "Am I my brother's keeper?"

And what will be the dangers of our formal recognition of the Cretan provisional government? The danger I anticipate is that certain journalists, including many hirelings of the Mussulman and his imperialistic and Tory upholders, will revile your action as they reviled it on so many other occasions. We are generally little addicted to trouble ourselves about foreign countries, but whenever a noble and heroic Christian people like that of Crete knocks at our doors for recognition we are more apt than the mother country gentry to grant it; not because we are their inferiors in culture and statesmanship, but because we are their superiors in severing from culture and statesmanship all that in their case adheres to it from the old feudal times, so that we retain of these attainments and accomplishments only what is consistent with humanity, and purge them from all that is irreconcilable with its sacred duties. So, Mr. Chairman, in this question of the recognition of Crete I reject all the callous sophistries and all the heartless numeraries which a perverse diplomacy fasten upon it.

See only a people who fought like lions for its liberty from 1821 to 1827, who conquered this liberty and possessed it till 1830, and which was then resold against its will into bondage, rising again and again upon its usurpers, and finally, in 1855-59, rebaptized its independence in its new war for national life, and entitled to our recognition of its provisional government as fully as the colonies were entitled to the recognition of Holland and France.

It is said that in taking this action we are unfriendly to the Ottoman, and that during our civil war the Moslem would not allow the Alabama to come to his ports. Neither Semmes nor any other rebel commodore ever thought of going to Levantine ports, well aware that they would not be there a day without being burnt by the Greeks, who to a man were our most enthusiastic friends during our war. But I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that if a rebel craft had been silly enough to run the risk of Greek fire, the Turk, whatever he may have promised to do on paper, and he is notorious for his liberality on paper, would in reality have acted as he would have been bid to act by the English and French ministers at Constantinople; for you are all aware that the Sultan does not hold sovereign power as it is held by Christian monarchs. Witness this present contest with Greece. Europe does not ask the Sultan whether he wishes to have a conference held, but orders it to take place. What would have been thought of the sovereignty of the American people if European Powers had, without our knowledge and consent, decreed to hold a conference to settle our conflict with the rebel States.

That the Sultan holds power only contingent upon the support and consent of Christendom is manifest throughout history from the moment of the invasion of these Asiatic hordes up to the present day. When the religious fervor of the Crusades had been impaired by the spirit of material enterprise engendered by the maritime discoveries and adventures of the fifteenth century, and when no further violent measures were taken to drive the Mussulman from his encampment on Greek and Christian soil he was even in those days of the demoralization of the Christian nations permitted only to claim jurisdiction over Mohammedans, while the entire Christian population, with inconsiderable exceptions, was protected by special treaties against the Moslem and placed under the jurisdiction of the foreign Powers or their consular and diplomatic representatives. Hence it follows that even if the Sultan had not usurped in Crete a power that had been conquered by the people in the Greek war of independence, even if he had been a lawful ruler, and even if the late revolution had not occurred, culminating in the establishment of a provisional government, he would still be an unsovereign ruler, limited in his jurisdiction. In the case of Crete, where the small minority of nominal Mussulman are of the Hellenic race and tongue, his jurisdiction would have been at best nominal, even if he ever had been since 1821 the lawful sovereign, and if whatever remained of his pretensions had not been annihilated by the recent revolution and by the efficient vindication of the popular and Christian rights of the people on the part of the provisional government.

We were not afraid to incur the displeasure of Queen Isabella of Spain, though her sovereign power was not contingent and conditional and hemmed in by all sort of treaties, as is that of the Sultan everywhere, not to speak of Crete, where, since 1821, it never had a right to be in any form whatsoever, absolute or limited. You will say that Isabella fled from Spain, and that Abdul-Aziz never ran away from Crete. My answer is that he never went there; he never dared go there; his predecessors, who, previous to 1821, lorded there, were laid low by the Greek masters of the country. I say the present Sultan, who never had a lawful sovereign right over Crete, acknowledged this fact by refraining from showing his face there, while Omer Pasha and Ali Pasha were sent back under protest and amid the execrations of an indignant people. That the Turk does not like our recognition of the Cretan provisional government is possible, nay probable. But our recognition of the independence of a free people, of a de facto Christian Government, is an act authorized by our sovereign power as a people. The English opposed Holland and France for recognizing the American colonies, nor did Spain and Portugal indorse the recognition of the independence of their former American colonies. In the progress of nationalities toward emancipation from alien domination those stripped of their ill-gotten power do not like it. Europe is full of royal princes fretting over their dispossession.

But if republican America does not weep over the misfortunes of these fallen Christian princes, why should we over the agonies of a Mormon Asiatic Moslem autocrat because he loses a power which he never had a right to possess? If we are to display emotions at all let us reserve them for the victims and martyrs of the Cretan war of independence; for those sainted women who, rather than be dishonored by the Mussulman, blew up the monastery of Arcadi, and were buried in its ruins. The Turk may have a great mission of his own to fulfill. I think that as soon as his encampment in Europe is broken up, and the hallowed old Christian flag of the Greek empire again hoisted upon St. Sophia at Constantinople, and upon the walls of Jerusalem, as soon as the benighted Moslem receives his passports from the Christian Powers, he may expand into the Asiatic wilderness, from whence he came, and there diffuse somewhat of that civilization which he ought to have learned from his long contact with the highly cultured Hellenic race.

I shall rejoice to see the Greek empire restored in all its ancient splendor, with Constantinople for its capital and Jerusalem for its holy city. In the mean while, however, let us not be forgetful of our duty as far as the recognition of the provisional government of Crete is concerned.

Crete, under the Greek empire and in the days of her connection with Venice, was the most flourishing center of the trade of the Mediterranean and the East. The island abounds with the choicest silk, fruits, wine, honey, olive oil, and other fine products. Under the Moslem usurpation these great commercial and industrial resources were paralyzed and nearly destroyed. Under the auspices of national independence the same marvelous result which manifested itself after the Greek war of independence in the development of enterprise among the Greek merchants and navigators, so as to give them at this day a place not inferior in the commercial world with that in former times held by the Hanse town, Genoa, and Venetian merchants; the same result will also show itself in Crete as soon as the example which I ask you to set in according your recognition to its Christian Government shall be, as I have no doubt it soon will be, followed by other Christian nations. Cretan merchants will then become as omnipotent in the Mediterranean and Black sea trade as at present the Greeks are; and American commerce and industry in those important regions will have acquired in the Cretan merchant an ally and customer whose coöperation may help us to compete successfully with the English and French traders and manufacturers who at present monopolize this great eastern traffic.

I propose, therefore, that the recognition of the provisional government of Crete shall be formally accorded by this Government, and that the present American consul at Canea shall be accredited as American representative near the government of Crete.

It is not the first time in our history that we display such generosity toward a fellow-Christian people. We have sent aid to Ireland in the hour of her distress; we sent a fleet to Asia Minor to bring the great Hungarian Kossuth to the United States; and under the eloquent influence of Clay and Webster have shown our sympathy for the Greeks in their first war of independence. We have done all this while our country was comparatively feeble and still struggling against the slavery power. Shall we do less at the present time, when we have attained to transcendent power after our triumph over slavery and the inauguration of our new and grander era of freedom? You will agree with me that we are expected, as we can afford, to do more than we did in the old slavery era. The Republican Chicago platform of last year appropriately decreed that sympathy with oppressed nationalities is among the first duties of our regenerated Republic.

This is the time to give a substantial interpretation of this sacred decree. Let us show by our recognition of Cretan independence that we are alive to our duty of gratitude toward a race to the intellectual glories of which we, together with all civilized nations, are indebted for our noblest culture. Let us show that we practically support the progress of liberal Governments among men, the only hope of the advancement of mankind. Let us show that as a Christian nation we favor the resumption of power of the great Greek race in the regions where they formerly held it, and which are endeared to America by their sacred and historical associations.

My proposition is not what is called an intervention. It simply implies an act of justice on our part toward Crete. Intervention, on the other hand, implies an active co-operation of our armed forces in the contest in the East. Such an intervention I do not propose; but the granting of Cretan recognition I do propose as the free offering of this great Christian people to another Christian people, which deserves all our moral and generous support in its heroic attempt to regain its former power and to free Christendom from that Moslem domination which has but too long disgraced its annals.

Let the Turks say, if they please, that we act in coöperation with Russia. Mr. Chairman, with all my regard for Russia, and particularly with my admiration for her humane act of serf-emancipation, I do not hesitate to say that we have as little to do with Russia as with England in this matter. If Russia sympathizes, as we do, with the progress of the Christian empire of the Hellenes in the East I am glad of it. But my proposition in favor of Cretan independence is prompted by my own appreciation of the virtues and the destinies of the Hellenic race, and submitted to you without desiring the applause of one or without fearing the censure of another foreign Power.

We have nothing to do with England's jealousy against Russian progress in Asia. Russia is a better friend of the United States than is Great Britain; and if Russia should gain possession of Hindostan and emancipate the Hindoo serfs, as she emancipated the Muscovite serfs, humanity will be the gainer, although the British aristocracy and plutocracy may be the loser; and we shall all say, "Well done, Czar! Hail to Russia!"

But however this may be, this much is certain: that the propositions which I make in behalf of Crete and Greece reflect only American and certainly not Russian opinion; and I am sure you will consider them in the same spirit, and not be deterred in the exercise of your international justice and mercy by those critics, trained in the old Tory schools, reëchoing on these free shores the worn-out European commonplaces about balance of power, and endeavoring to stifle your generous action by holding before you the powers of emperors and sultans, but which I dare say have no terrors for the American mind, and will not arrest the course of justice and magnanimity toward Crete and Greece which I have the honor and privilege to propose to this House.

Mr. Chairman, it is with reluctance that I occupy the time of this House, and have done so only because the case is urgent and the cause I plead is just. I come before the Representatives of a great people to speak for the rights of man, and, sustained by the importance of the subject, I felt determined for the work; and yet I trembled at the responsibility it involved and recognized my inability to discharge the trust. From my childhood having witnessed the barbarism of human slavery, the cries of the oppressed ever awaken in my heart a sympathy and respect. I will espouse the cause of the oppressed and scorn the uncertain friendship of the oppressor. Having lived a free man under laws and institutions that guaranteed to me life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, my only earthly ambition is to secure the same to others. Having witnessed the treason to my own country of every son and daughter of the Republic who was in favor of anarchy, monarchy, aristocracy, or slavery, and having seen them, sustained by crowned heads of foreign lands, wage a traitorous and murderous war against their own Government and people for their destruction, and having seen every slave and outcast from the national protection faithful to liberty and law, remaining the friends of the Government and its defenders through a storm of treason and a maelstrom of crime, I have renewed cause to love the oppressed and to hate the oppressor. With pride remembering our ancestors, who in wisdom founded and in their blood cemented this Republic, and having witnessed the self-sacrifice of our people, who recently struck down the armed and treacherous oppressor, drove the foreign minions from our shores, saved from the usurper's grasp a sister republic, let the oppressed go free, gave to the slave his manhood, opened the door for his education, secured a protection for his wife and children, made sacred the social relations of life, which had been so long set at defiance by semi-barbarians who infested the southern States and denominated themselves the privileged classes, claiming an inherent right to own and dispose of the persons and property of others, my confidence in our race is strengthened and my hopes of free government renewed.

This country having furnished food and clothing to the distressed of every clime, and sustained thousands of wives and children while their husbands and fathers waged a bloody, treacherous, and relentless war against liberty and the nation's life; having pardoned millions of criminals who by their treason had forfeited their lives to the law; having provided for the immediate wants of five millions of an unfortunate and helpless race who by the necessity of war emerged from a slavery of two hundred and forty years, in which the heavy hand of the oppressor had borne upon them with cruel severity; and having seen this country made by law and practice the home of the oppressed of all lands who have sought protection on our shores, I am well assured of the magnanimity of the Government and the charity of our people.

Witnessing the glorious triumph of this Republic, as she stands to-day the political high school of the world, in which nations and peoples are learning the great truths so long concealed, that "man is capable of self-government," setting at naught that deceptive and infamous doctrine, "the divine right of kings," opening a free and better civilization, I believe, sir, that the time has come and now is when we must—I repeat it, when we must—foster the rise and progress of free governments everywhere, and thus maintain the character we have so nobly earned and fulfill a great destiny set before us. The promulgation of correct political doctrines, which set free both the minds and bodies of men, is of infinitely more value to those who adopt them than the arts, manufactures, and commerce; for it brings all these, and makes the people great and prosperous while producing them. Then, sir, as we would render a service and duty to God, Christian civilization, the progress of free institutions, and to a common humanity, let me again urge you to encourage the independence of Crete.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will yield to me, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield for that motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, then, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COBB having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CULLOM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the President's annual message of 1867, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEWART moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

Joint resolution relating to reciprocity of trade with the Dominion of Canada:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That having an intelligent regard for the best interests of Vermont, it is the duty of our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence against the consummation of any treaty relating to reciprocity in trade with the Dominion of Canada, and to insist that the subject of our trade and commercial intercourse with Canada, as well as with all other foreign countries, is not a proper matter of treaty stipulation, but belongs to Congress, and should be wisely regulated by a judicious tariff.

Resolved, That the secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit a copy of this joint resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives.

GEORGE W. GRANDNEY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

STEPHEN THOMAS,

President of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks upon this resolution at some time when it will be convenient to the Senate, at as early a day as possible, and if nothing intervenes to prevent it, I shall probably ask permission to do so on Wednesday next, at one o'clock. I move now that the resolution be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 747) to regulate the price and encourage the production of cotton in the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to state that this is a bill which has been carefully prepared by a wealthy and distinguished planter of the State of Mississippi, who has given the subject a great deal of attention. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 193) to place Junius J. Boyle upon the active list of commodores; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISTRICT RECORDER AND WARDEN.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 712) to provide for the appointment of recorder of deeds and warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and that the bill be taken up for consideration at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the bill mentioned by the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I find there is a difference of opinion among members of the Senate in relation to the propriety of changing the mode of appointing the recorder of deeds; and in order to avoid a discussion on that subject I move to strike out the second, third, and fourth sections of the bill, all of which relate to that matter.

The sections proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the appointment of recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia shall be, and is hereby, vested in the supreme court of said District; and the recorder so appointed from time to time shall hold said office during the pleasure of said court, and shall qualify and perform all the duties of said office as provided by law, and shall receive as compensation for said services such sum as may be fixed by said court, not exceeding the rate of $3,000 per annum, exclusive of the necessary expenses of said office.

SEC. 3. *And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said recorder to employ from time to time, subject to the approval of said court, a sufficient number of copyists to enable him to keep up the current records and indexes of said office with necessary and reasonable promptness, and, as the fees and income of said office will justify, to copy such of the records as have become defaced or obliterated and to index the same. And the said copyists shall receive such compensation for services rendered by them, either by the piece or by the day, as the said court may determine, not exceeding five cents per hundred words for copying, and not exceeding twelve cents per hundred words for indexing, or not exceeding three dollars per day for each faithful day's work of eight hours' duration to each of said copyists: *Provided, That the salary of the recorder, compensation of copyists, cost of blanks, blank books, stationery, fuel, light, office rent, and all other necessary expenses of said office shall not in any case exceed the aggregate fees and emoluments as provided by law.

SEC. 4. *And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the recorder of deeds to receive all the fees and emoluments of the said office, and to deposit the same from day to day with the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, taking his receipt therefor. It shall be the duty of said clerk to give bond, with approved security, in such sum as the said court may determine, to receive, receipt for, safely keep, and to pay out said funds, on orders to be drawn by the recorder of deeds, accompanied by vouchers approved by the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, for the salary of said recorder, compensation of copyists, and other necessary expenses of said office, and at the close of each calendar year to pay over any surplus that may be in his hands to the treasurers of the city of Washington, of the city of Georgetown, and of the levy court of the county of Washington, respectively, to be added to the school funds of said cities and county, and to be used for the support of schools, in proportion to the number of children to be benefited thereby in each of said corporations, the award to be made by said supreme court: *Provided, That said clerk is hereby authorized to retain for his services two per cent. per annum for all moneys received and properly accounted for under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. There are some amendments proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to a subsequent section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the committee will be read.

The first amendment of the committee was in section six, line seven, after the word "register" to strike out the following words:

And which may be filed, recorded, made, and certified by the said William G. Flood up to the date of the appointment of recorder of deeds under the provisions of this act shall.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Up to the date of the appointment and qualification of his successor shall be.

So that the section will read:

That all deeds of conveyance, leases, powers of attorney, and other written instruments required by law to be filed and recorded, and all copies of instruments and records and certificates authorized by law, filed, recorded, made, and certified by William G. Flood, as acting register of deeds for said District since the death of Edward C. Eddie, late register, up to the date of the appointment and qualification of his successor, shall be, and are hereby, declared to be legally performed, the same as if the said William G. Flood had been legally appointed and qualified as register of deeds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, line seventeen, to strike out the word "have," and in line eighteen to strike out the words "or may accrue;" so that the clause will read:

And the said William G. Flood is hereby declared to be entitled to all the legal fees and emoluments of said office for his said services which have been hitherto allowed the register of deeds, and which accrued during said period.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know what changes are made in the existing law by this bill? Is the only effect of it to provide that the President shall not appoint the warden of the jail, but that the supreme court of the District shall appoint him?

Mr. HARLAN. That part has been stricken out which relates to the change of the mode of appointing the register of deeds. It now changes the title of the office from register to recorder, and fixes definitely the fees that the recorder may receive, and also legalizes the acts performed by the then incumbent, Mr. Flood, after the decease of the old officer, intervening between the date of his death and the date of the appointment of the present incumbent.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not transfer the appointing power from the President to the supreme court?

Mr. HARLAN. Not of the register.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does it transfer?

Mr. HARLAN. It transfers the appointment of the warden of the jail from the President to the supreme court of the District.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the whole bill; the substance of it?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir; that is the substance of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that the President ought to appoint an officer of that kind, an executive officer having in charge the execution of the law. It seems to me that a jailor or a sheriff ought never to be appointed by a court. Formerly in all the States the sheriffs were appointed by the courts; but I think the constitutions of all the States now require them to be elected. In my opinion, a jailor or a sheriff ought not to be appointed by a court; but still, if the committee have examined the subject, I do not wish to interpose. I think it bad policy to allow a court to have any patronage whatever except the mere appointment of a clerk—a person who discharges a portion of its duties; but those who are in custody of prisoners, such as a warden or a jailor, are executive officers, and it seems to me their appointment should be left to the Executive. Still, if the committee have given the matter attention, as I know very little about it except in regard to the general principle, I shall not interpose.

Mr. HARLAN. Ordinarily I would agree with the Senator from Ohio. I think the principle he has announced is correct; but in this case I differ from him in opinion, having observed the practice for a number of years and the effect of it. Formerly the warden was an appointee of the marshal of the District, but by legislation it was made an independent office. There is now no supervisory control over that officer except that which the President of the United States may see proper to exercise, and every Senator will perceive at once that it is impossible that he should take a personal supervision of the duties of that office; and it was thought by the committee that the best supervision we could establish by law would be that of the supreme court of the District. The jailor is in constant communication with the court, and they would be very likely to know whether he is performing his duty or not.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read, "A bill to define the fees of recorder of deeds, and to provide for the appointment of warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

WAGON-ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to take up the consideration of Senate bill No. 167.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 167) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg, in said State, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was to add at the end of the first section the following words:

Or any lands to which homestead or preëmption rights have attached.

So that the proviso will read:

And provided further, That the grant hereby made shall not embrace any mineral lands of the United States or any lands to which homestead or preëmption rights have attached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line five, to strike out "ten" and insert "six," so that it will read:

That the State of Oregon is authorized to locate and use in the construction of said road an additional amount of public lands not previously reserved to the United States nor otherwise disposed of, and not exceeding six miles in distance from it, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon whether this will obligate the United States to make up elsewhere any deficiency on the line of the road, provided there is not the full complement of lands provided for? I have not had time to read the bill. It provides for a certain quantity of land for ten miles. Now, if those lands should be taken up and already settled and paid for, I want to know whether there is any provision that the United States shall not be compelled to make up the deficiency elsewhere?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state to the Senator that the bill provides that only three alternate sections on each side of the road shall be granted; and if those three sections have been appropriated in any other way, then the deficiency may be made up within six miles of the road. That is all that the bill provides. It does not provide, as many of the bills have heretofore, that the road may go ten miles on each side, but it is confined, in the first place, to three miles on each side of the line. If any portion of the alternate sections within these three miles have been taken up by settlers then they may go out six miles on each side of the road to make up the deficiency. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose that the principle upon which lands have heretofore been granted for railroads has been that it would increase the price of those remaining to the Government. If all the lands have been taken up on the line of the road I can see no more propriety in giving lands elsewhere to build a road in a particular locality than there would be to give lands to an old State. The Government is to receive no benefit from it; there is to be no doubling of the price of the remainder of the lands held by the Government; and if the principle is to be adopted here of giving lands in land States anywhere without any regard to increasing the value of the remaining lands in those States, it would seem to me just as proper to give them to the old States for building railroads as to the new States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not favor any such principle as the Senator opposes. He will see, by looking at this bill, that the State can only go six miles on each side of the road. The land which they take, under any circumstances, must be on the line of the road. In the first place, they are only allowed to go three miles on each side of the road; and if they do not find the land then they are to go six miles on each side of the road; so that the land is located, in any event, on the line of the road. I would not favor the passage of any bill that authorized a State to take vacant lands in the State wherever they could be found, to be appropriated for the use of any particular locality.

I have a map here, and can exhibit the condition of the country and the situation of the points referred to if the Senator desires to look at it; but I will state to the Senator that Roseburg is the county seat of Douglas county, and the chief town of the Umpqua valley. It is surrounded on all sides by mountains. This bill proposes to assist in the construction of a road from Roseburg to the navigable waters of Coos bay through the Coast Range of mountains, so that there may be access to the ocean from Roseburg through the mountains. It is a very difficult and expensive road to construct, and it is very necessary to the people there that they should have this way of egress and ingress. The distance is little more than fifty or sixty miles.

There are some small valleys in these mountains in which the land may be worth something, and it is possible that there may be some timber on the mountains that may be used by the State in the construction of this road with advantage. But it is a very short road. It runs through a range of mountains which shuts in Umpqua valley from the ocean. It will be of great value to the people of the valley, and enhance the price of the lands selected in the neighborhood of Coos bay. There is a considerable quantity of land there that is available for agricultural purposes, as I am informed, and if they can get into the interior of the State across these mountains and back again people will go there and settle on those lands, and in that way it will be of advantage to the Government. The grant is a very limited one, and in view of the great advantages to the people of the State I hope there will be no serious objection made to the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it is proper that the Senate should know wherein this bill is different from bills that are ordinarily passed to aid the construction of military roads. It is in the provision to which the Senator from Vermont has called attention. I do not recollect of any other bills in which the deficit is allowed to be made up outside of the limits of the grant. This is the adoption in regard to wagon-road grants of the principle that applies to railroad grants. Grants are made to railroads of the alternate sections either six or ten miles on each side of the road; and if any portion of the granted lands have been sold by the Government or otherwise disposed of then the deficiency is made up by the selection of lands within a limited distance outside. Ordinarily the grants to wagon-roads have been simply the lands within a specified limit without this right to make up the deficiency. I believe the committee was induced to favor this bill in consideration that the road passes through a mountainous country to a very considerable extent. If the road be well made it would perhaps require very nearly the amount of land that is granted. The road will be a costly one to build, and the lands for a very considerable distance in the mountains will not be of value. Therefore, I believe, upon that reason the committee was willing that this provision should be in the bill.

I think in this class of bills there ought to be some requirement as to the character of the road to be built. Congress makes a grant of land for the construction of a wagon-road or a military road, and there ought to be some provision securing a road of value. But that has seemed to be impracticable. We have not been able yet to specify any plan. Thus far Congress has left it to the States or Territories in which the lands are granted to secure a suitable road.

I have stated the only difference in this grant from the ordinary grants that have been made. The committee supposed that the road will be a useful one if it can be constructed. It will be mainly through a region of country that is not now inhabited, and that it will be difficult to settle perhaps, but it will connect a desirable part of the country with the coast.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish simply to correct the honorable Senator from Indiana an supposing that this bill inaugurates a new principle. I am very confident that since I have been here several bills have been passed providing for wagon-roads that allowed the deficiency to be made up from lands contiguous to the line of the road. And I know that one or two bills of that kind have been passed at my instance since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to be understood as saying that this is the only bill of that kind. I say it is substantially a new feature in this kind of legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should be perfectly willing to have the three miles stricken out, and the State allowed to go six miles on each side, without any provision for the deficiency. But this bill is remarkable in this respect, that the State is confined to three miles in width on each side, and, if I am not mistaken, heretofore these grants have extended six or ten miles on each side. This is simply a provision extending the right to the State to take each alternate section of land for three miles on each side of the road, and if land is not found in the three miles, then it may go six miles. There is a provision in the bill that this road shall be constructed "with such width, graduation, and bridges as to permit of its regular use as a wagon-road, and in such other special manner as the State of Oregon may prescribe;" and it is further provided that if it is not completed within five years no further sales shall be made, but the lands remaining unsold shall revert to the United States.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 281) for the relief of Edwin B. Hoag;

A bill (H. R. No. 967) to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, to the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Lewis D. Smith.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana.

NATIONAL CURRENCY ACT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 722) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," by extending certain penalties to accessories, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage. It is a very short bill, to which I presume there will be no objection, and there is some necessity for its passage. I ask, therefore, that it may be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There is an amendment reported merely to make the reference to the law accurate.

The amendment was read. It was, in line five, to strike out "fifty-five" and insert "fifty-two;" and in line eight, after the word "thereof," to insert "approved February 25, 1863;" so as to make the bill read:

That every person who shall aid or abet any officer or agent of any association in doing any of the acts enumerated in section fifty-two of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863, with intent to defraud or deceive, shall be liable to the same punishment therein provided for the principal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely say, in explanation, that recently a very great fraud was committed in Boston, whereby either a bank or the United States will suffer a loss of $600,000; and it was found that while the law enabled the officers of the bank to be punished, it did not provide for the punishment of those outside, not officers of the bank, who had aided and abetted in the fraud. This is merely to correct that, so that parties who aid and abet such officers may also be punished. I take it there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 281) for the relief of Edwin B. Hoag—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 967) to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador to the United States—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Lewis D. Smith—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LAND TITLES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. THAYER. I move to take up, for consideration, Senate bill No. 730.

Mr. POMEROY. That is a bill which was reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been reported to-day, it will require unanimous consent for its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 730) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to confirm the titles to certain lands in the State of Nebraska," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It declares that the provisions and benefits of an act to confirm the titles to certain lands in the State of Nebraska, approved in 1866, shall be extended to the east half and northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section nine, township fifteen, range thirteen, east sixth principal meridian, in Douglas county, Nebraska; and confirms the title thereto to the parties holding by deed from the patentee.

The Committee on Public Lands proposed to fill the first blank with "25th," and the second with "July;" so as to read, "approved the 25th day of July, A. D. 1868."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I will only say that this bill relates to forty acres of land, the title to which was not confirmed at the last session because it was in litigation, but the matter has now been settled, and this bill is merely to confirm the title to the party that the court gave it to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska, so that there shall be no doubt about it, whether he knows the fact that the litigation in dispute between the claimants in regard to this land has been settled? This piece of land was left by the committee out of the bill of last year because there was a pending dispute, and some of us thought Congress ought not to undertake to settle law suits. I understand, though I have no satisfactory information on the subject, that that litigation is at an end; and that being so, it is proper to settle the title so far as the Government of the United States is concerned.

Mr. THAYER. As the Senator from Indiana has stated, this tract of land was left out of the bill passed last year, so as not to be affected by it on account of the litigation then existing. The parties to that litigation have settled the question in dispute, and all parties now ask for the passage of this bill. I have that information from the parties themselves. It is the desire of all parties interested that this bill shall pass.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1598) to relieve from disabilities R. W. Best and Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. John's, Michigan.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it was not my purpose yesterday when I obtained the floor to make any extended remarks upon the bill now before the Senate. I was surprised when hostility showed itself to this bill. It seemed to me so obviously right that I could not understand why Senators for whose judgment I have so much respect should object to it. Now, the facts are simply these, as I understand them: these two girls owned a tract of land near Decatur, in the State of Alabama, on which there were houses and other improvements. After that section of the State of Alabama had come within the lines of the United States Army, and was no longer under the control or within the lines of the confederate forces, the commanding general found it to be important, with a view to future military necessities and movements, to fortify the town of Decatur and to make a strong position at that point. With that view he made the order referred to yesterday by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] and a further order was made directing the occupancy of the lands owned by these two girls. The lands were taken possession of, the house was removed, and upon the very locality of the house Fort No. 1 was built. Other parts of the land were occupied with rifle-pits and other defenses. All the improvements were removed, and the committee finds that those improvements were of the value at least of $7,000. The simple question is, whether this property thus appropriated by the authority of the United States ought to be paid for by them; and upon a question like that there is no room for doubt in my mind.

There are two objections urged. The first will not do, in my judgment, in the Senate of the United States. It is said that we cannot afford to pay this class of claims; that the Treasury cannot bear the burden. Mr. President, this is an argument for repudiation; and if I am prepared to-day to say that these girls have a just claim, a legal claim, a moral claim against the Government of the United States for their property which it has taken, and if I am prepared to say that that just and legal claim shall not be paid because the Government cannot well afford it and because the people cannot well afford to pay it, then I am prepared to say that the bondholder shall not be paid, because I hold that the obligation of the Government to pay for property which it takes from the citizen is of as high a grade as, if not a higher order of obligation than, that resting simply on contract. There is no constitutional obligation that the Government shall always and in every instance observe its contracts; but there is a constitutional obligation resting, as I hold, upon myself as a Senator that the property taken by the Government for public use shall be paid for.

And I think, sir, it will not do to say that the Government is not able to pay its debts. This property was worth $7,000. The committee so finds. It was taken from these girls in 1864. There was a promise at that time by the Constitution that they should be paid for this property which was taken for public use. That very fort built upon the site of the dwelling-house, those rifle-pits dug upon their land, were subsequently used in battle to turn the forces of Hood in their advance northward. That property and that appropriation of property became of the very greatest importance to the country. Perhaps no property was taken during the whole progress of the war which was so valuable in its use for military purposes as the property taken from these two girls.

The Constitution, the day that property was taken, said that it was taken for public use, and should be paid for. That was the promise; not a bond signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but an obligation resting upon the Constitution itself, the whole nation having promised these two persons that they should be paid for their property.

A bond on that same day was issued, say, paid for in a very depreciated currency; every six months the bondholder has received his interest; his interest in gold has now amounted to very nearly the amount of money he advanced. It is regarded as a high offense, and I do not question it here; I am not up for the purpose of questioning it; it is regarded as a very high political offense to question for a moment the obligation to pay that bond; but it is all right, and regarded as an act of political virtue to say that the Treasury shall not be burdened by an obligation of higher character and grade, if a promise by the Constitution is higher than a promise in the bond! I call the attention of Senators to this consideration of it, that they may deliberately decide whether they are ready to adopt, for the purpose of defeating this little claim, the sentiment of repudiation.

So much for that view of the subject. Next, sir, it is said that this was enemy's country. In fact it was not so. In fact it was within the lines of the Army of the United States. The authority of the Government had been reestablished at that place. Why then, sir, shall they not be paid? As I said before, I do not admit the doctrine upon which the Senator from Michigan now stands. I do not admit that these two girls of necessity were enemies of the country. That has not been the political view of the subject, and upon that I intend to read what I regard as very high authority, the statement of fact made by a gentleman then occupying a very distinguished position in the party of the majority of this body. And here is the doctrine as he declared it:

"From the beginning of the war up to the present time every message of the President, every proclamation, every State paper, and every act of Congress has proceeded upon the hypothesis that no State could secede from the Union; that once in the Union always in the Union. Mr. Lincoln in every proclamation went on the principle that this war was an insurrection, a rebellion against the Constitution and laws of the United States; not a rebellion of States, but a rebellion of the individuals, the people of the several southern States; and every man who went into it was personally and individually responsible for his acts, and could not shield himself under the action or authority of his State. He went on the principle that every ordinance of session, every act of the Legislatures of the rebel States in that direction was a nullity unconstitutional and void, having no legal force or effect whatever, and that as these States were according to law in the Union their standing could not be affected by the action of the people; that the people of these States were personally responsible for their conduct just as a man is responsible who violates the statute in regard to the commission of murder, and to be treated as criminals just as the authorities thought proper; that the people of a State can forfeit their rights, but that so far as their action is concerned in a legal point of view they had no power to affect the condition of the State in the Union. Every proclamation and every act of Congress have proceeded upon this hypothesis. Mr. Buchanan started out with the proposition that this was a rebellion of States. He said we could not coerce a State. Our reply was, we have nothing whatever to do with States; we will coerce the people of the States, holding every man responsible for his conduct."

That was a declaration of the position of the Government, very shortly after the close of the war, that each party who participated in the rebellion was personally responsible.

Can that personal responsibility, then, attach to the neighbor that took no part in the war? Can it be held that because a large body of persons violated their constitutional and legal obligations in inciting a rebellion, in carrying on a war, therefore those citizens who did not participate in this wrongful conduct are to have the character impressed upon them which the acts of the other parties impressed upon themselves? I repudiate the sentiment. I do not think that it rests upon law, and I know that it is not consistent with the view that we ought to take of it. I ask gentlemen whether these two girls, because of the existence of the war, ceased to be citizens of the United States? Did they cease to owe allegiance to the Government of the United States? Never. Their legal relation to the United States was never changed; their obligation of allegiance remained all the while.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. HENDRICKS. With pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. If it be true that this claimant never ceased to be a citizen of the United States—and I agree with the Senator in that—and if this claim rests upon the ground that the private property of a citizen being taken the United States is bound to make compensation, does she stand upon any different footing on account of her loyalty from that which she would occupy if in truth she was disloyal? Does the fact of her loyalty increase her citizenship and make this constitutional provision more operative? And if by her side was a person with the same case, except that she was disloyal in the condition of her mind, both being non-combatants, would it at all affect the obligation or diminish the obligation to pay?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, we are discussing a case that is now before the Senate. When any other party presents a claim it will be sufficient time then to consider the merits of that claim. The fidelity of these two girls to the Government has not been disputed. That they were true all the while, that they were ready to administer to the comforts of the soldiers who came by that way with water from the well or food, is not disputed. Now, sir, I think that it is not fair argument to lay alongside of this case the case of a party who went into the war, who brought on the necessity, who was the cause of the war, if I may so express it. I think there is a very great difference. In the case of a party who stood by the Government all the while, who did all that he could to aid the Government, if the Government takes his property it is unquestionably a case of a contract to pay for that property. But the party who brings on the strife, who is the cause of the difficulty and of the war in which his property is lost, has no such claim as that.

Now, sir, to return to the argument. These girls were citizens; no Senator claims that they lost their citizenship; no Senator claims that they ceased to owe allegiance to the Government of the United States; no Senator claims that they did not faithfully discharge all their duties to that obligation of allegiance and fidelity. Why not pay the debt, then?

If the property had been taken from a neighbor of the Senator from Michigan, up near the city of Detroit, would he not raise his voice for payment? Would he not say that the Constitution and moral obligation both required its payment? Then I ask where is the difference between a case that may occur near Detroit, in Michigan, and a case that occurred near Decatur, in the State of Alabama, when that locality was occupied by the Army of the United States after the rebellion had been suppressed, so far as that locality was concerned? If there be merit special and peculiar it is in favor of the party down at Decatur. The party there, to be faithful to the Government, had to stand up against public sentiment, while the party near Detroit, to stand by the Government, would run with public sentiment. The case of these two girls, then, is stronger, in my judgment, than if they had lived in one of the northern States.

Mr. President, my purpose was mainly to answer the argument which had been urged so frequently, that the Treasury could not afford to pay this money. In this case it is, I believe, but $7,000. When a like case of equal merits is presented here I shall vote for it, as I voted for the case of Mr. Armes, in Virginia, where his school property was taken because it was necessary to occupy the grounds for military purposes. We paid for that property, and we said it was right to do so. His fidelity to the Government was sufficiently established; the loss of his property, by an appropriation on the part of the Government, was established; and we said that those two propositions being established it ought to be paid for. Why not, then, pay for this property that is provided for in this bill? I shall vote for it with great pleasure; and I do not think there is any danger of bankrupting the Treasury by doing so. There may be other claims. I have no doubt there will be other claims. When they are meritorious, when the property has been taken for useful purposes in the prosecution of the war, it ought to be paid for. The people are able to pay for that which is right. They have to pay for a good deal that ought never to be paid for; and when a case is clear and plain, where there have been no advantages of political position to secure contracts, but where property has been taken for a great purpose, my vote shall be to pay for it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have convinced myself that this case is one of great importance; that the bill we are now considering is practically one of the most important likely to be considered during this session; and if I were to forecast the financial measures of this session I should be willing to prophecy that no bill of more practical importance touching the finances of the Government will be considered finally than this. It is not important because it involves $7,000, nor merely because it is one claim of a class. It had when it came here from the committee, and it has acquired during its consideration, an importance far greater than that. Had it been brought forward as the bill to which the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has referred, in the ordinary, I will not say in the casual, manner of reports from committees, had it been acted upon sub silentio, although it would have constituted a precedent, it would have constituted a precedent in hardly a greater sense than a judgment pro forma in a court. But it was reported from the committee as a test case. So it came announced to the Senate. It has been largely, if not thoroughly, discussed and treated as a pioneer case—as a case the adjudication of which is to constitute a precedent upon which the Senate will rest.

And now I wish I could successfully invite the attention of every Senator to this single proposition, if to no other, to wit: that should this bill be adopted, the questions which it involves will not be reargued before this tribunal until its constitution is changed, if ever. Let me repeat myself: while the Senate is composed of its present members, after such a discussion as this bill has undergone, the questions which it involves will not be reopened, nor will a reargument be made. Distinctions will be sought, and perhaps found, between this case in its particularity and other cases said to bear a resemblance to it; and I think I shall be able to show that those distinctions will be sought in vain in the midst of the countless multitude of coming cases. Therefore, I shall make no apology for asking the attention of the Senate to an answer to some of the suggestions which have been made, feeling, as I do, that I cannot address myself to a subject of more interest to the people I represent than the question whether, in a case like this, and in all other like cases, that sum of money which no process of arithmetic now can compute is to be taken from the Treasury and given to we know not whom.

If the purpose was, Mr. President—and I do not impute it to any Senator—to render the war from which we have emerged odious, to discredit and disparage the intelligence of the two Houses of Congress, it could be successfully accomplished by obtaining from the Senate a judgment that the legislation of the country has been so neglected that the Government of the United States is now bound by law to make compensation for the injury which was done, for the calamity which befell citizens in the prosecution of that bloody war in which the Government was driven to engage. And when I hear Senators talk about repudiation, and address to the Senate or to the galleries suggestions that some parallel is to be run between those who challenge this claim and those who set commercial and national honor at defiance by trampling our public obligations under their feet, I am almost compelled to look for some cause of such argument which ought not to be found, and usually is not found, within the precincts of this Chamber. I have no wish to see the Senate repudiate any just claim; but I have a great wish that at the threshold of bills of this description we should ascertain as definitely as we may whether the Government owes anything to such claimants; and if so, upon what principle, and how much.

What is this case? In 1864 the claimant was a citizen of the State of Alabama. A disorder had broken out in Alabama and elsewhere. It was the primary duty of the State government in Alabama to quell that insurrection, and interpose between it and the citizens of the State. Disregarding this duty, not exerting within the limits of possibility or convenience its power, the government of Alabama was found in front of the rebellion. It led the assault; and thus the Government of the United States found itself doubly charged with the duty of interfering and persevering to the end. The Government did interfere, exerting that right and acknowledging that duty which the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] yesterday in such forcible language told us existed. This disorder spread among many States, and ran into a public civil war, a war in all respects pertinent to this inquiry. The ports of this very State and of other States were blockaded; and that word contains now, as it contained then, that volume of significance which alone determines the question, so far as this Government can determine it, whether a war existed or not. Carrels for the exchange of prisoners were made. The world looked on, and every nation said "this is a public war;" and history said it was the greatest and most destructive war the world had ever seen. What did this Government, especially, say? Every department of it, executive, legislative, and judicial, said it was a public war in all its bearings and all its attributes. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the prize cases, said not only as I have affirmed, but said other things bearing more particularly, as I hope I can show the Senate, upon this precise question.

Now, sir, the law-making power, both by direction and by indirection, too, vested the President of the United States with the power to issue the proclamations which he did; and two of those proclamations—one will suffice for this purpose—denominated the State of Alabama and the whole of it as enemy's country, not in so many words, but in the construction given by the Supreme Court in the cases which I hold in my hand. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] waves his "ambrosial curls" in dissent to that proposition; but I beg of him to listen for one moment and see if I am not right in what I say.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Wisconsin will hear with great pleasure the Senator from New York, and lay his ambrosial curls aside. I beg the Senator to understand, however, that I am not the man who deals in ambrosial curls. [Laughter.] I was about to call his attention to the proposition he made just now, that those proclamations asserted that the whole of Alabama was enemy's territory. I was about to ask him to point to any one proclamation which said that; and he qualified it at once by saying it was not so said in terms, but something was said upon which the Supreme Court based its construction. Now I shall hear the Senator with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. First of all, I must set right with the honorable Senator from Wisconsin the other point. I know there was a time, five or six years ago, when conservatism was somewhat rampant in the Republican party, when it was thought injurious to politicians to say that their hair curled. [Laughter.] That time passed some time ago; and for that reason, if for no other, I beg the honorable Senator to believe that I did not intend in any way to inflict an injury upon him by indulging myself in a somewhat trite quotation.

Mr. HOWE. I certainly did not suspect the honorable Senator from New York of an intention to fix a stigma on any gentleman by alluding to his curls. I think he would be the last one to attempt to stain a man in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. I take that precisely as the Senator leaves it, and that, I suppose, is a condonation all around of the offense which the Senator seems, in a good-natured way, to have taken at my remark.

Now, Mr. President, my proposition was and is that the President of the United States by proclamation put the State of Alabama in the situation of enemy's country. Upon that the Senator takes issue. Whether he takes issue upon the fact of such a proclamation or upon the legal effect of that proclamation I do not know, and in the absence of information I will try to defend my statement upon both points. First, I take it, nobody denies that the President issued a proclamation declaring that territory represented by the geographical limits of the State of Alabama to be insurrectionary territory. Does the Senator deny that? I inquire of the Senator whether he puts me to the proof that the President issued a proclamation declaring that district, that locality, or, if there be a distinction, the inhabitants of that locality known as the State of Alabama in insurrection?

Mr. HOWE. I put the Senator to the proof of showing that the President did anything more than to say that an insurrection existed in the State of Alabama; and when he said that, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he explained the consequences which he attached to the fact stated by him, that an insurrection existed in the State of Alabama; but in no one of his proclamations did he say how much or how little of the State of Alabama was involved in the insurrection.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, I heard years ago a very old lawyer, and a very acute one, say that when a contract was made for the sale of a horse it carried his head, his tail, and the whole of him, and it was not necessary to be any more particular than to say it was the sale of a horse. By parity of reasoning, if the Senator will excuse me, I had supposed that when a State or a county or a parish or a township, or any other entire geographical thing was nominated, the designation meant precisely, as it implied, the whole of that thing; and I should suppose, if the honorable Senator had not made the suggestion, that it would be very, very far-fetched to attempt to say that it applied to it at all without applying to the whole of it; and that if it did apply to a part of it, and not to the whole, it applied to some particular part of which you could make that affirmation, declaring that, as to the other part, its operation was absent. I shall not stop to argue that, because it is too fine-spun for me. When the State of New York is spoken of it means the State of New York, and so when the State of Alabama is spoken of it means the State of Alabama; and when the people of the State of New York are spoken of it means the four million people who inhabit that State.

Mr. HOWE. That the Senator, if I do not embarrass him—

Mr. CONKLING. Not in the slightest.

Mr. HOWE. That the Senator and myself may comprehend just the point of difference between us, let me say a word. I know I can see that under some circumstances when the State of New York is referred to it may include the whole of the State of New York; but the Senator certainly would insist, if a newspaper paragraph stated that the small-pox had broken out in New York, that we should not necessarily conclude that the small-pox prevailed throughout the State of New York; and if the small-pox could prevail in a part and not the whole of the State of New York, could not an insurrection exist in a part and not the whole of the State of New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. I hardly know whether that remark of the Senator is intended by way of pleasantry or law. If by way of pleasantry, it is good, because it makes my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] laugh; and notwithstanding his proverbial good nature there must be wit in it, or he would not laugh. But if it is intended as a matter of law, I need not point out to the Senator the total dissimilarity between that case and this. When you talk about the people of a State as to their condition politically, then you are talking about one thing. If you say a horse has run away in the State of Wisconsin, you of course do not imply that he ran all over the State of Wisconsin in running away; and yet the Senator might as well put that case to me, I submit, as to put the case he does.

I think, then, we are agreed that the President did issue a proclamation in which he declared in insurrection the people of the State of Alabama. Now, I say that that proclamation, with the force which the Supreme Court gives to presidential proclamations, carried with it the whole force of determining that that was enemy's territory. The President by virtue of the same power proclaimed a blockade; and the Supreme Court said, in the prize cases, that by virtue of that proclamation alone a blockade existed; and they said also that he had legislative sanction for it. I can put my eye upon the paragraph in a moment, for I have the case before me; but I will not stop to do it.

Now, if in truth this was a civil war, a public war, if in truth those waging it on the other side, although they were called rebels and insurrectionists, nevertheless were a belligerent, as the Supreme Court has decided, I ask at what point it is that the argument can fail to show that this was enemy's territory? And if it was not enemy's territory I ask what rood of land within the limits of the Republic in the year 1864 was enemy's territory? Will any Senator tell me that the accident of the time, determining whether the Army was in truth camping there or whether contending armies were engaged in a grapple for the mastery, decided whether it was enemy's territory or not? I think no lawyer will say that; and if he will not, then this is the palpable case—assuming that the late war could present it—of occurrences in a theater of war, and in a territory within military lines and within the original occupation of one of the belligerents, by whom it was so wrenched step by step as the Army proceeded.

That, then, is this case upon its facts so far. This claimant was a citizen, under those circumstances, of that State. Now, what is the bill? This sum of money is to be appropriated—

"in full payment for damages done her farm in Decatur, Alabama, by reason of the same being occupied for military purposes, and for the destruction of the buildings and other property thereon."

Here, then, is imbedded in this bill, entering at least as an ingredient into this computation, the circumstance that this claimant's land was occupied for military purposes. That cannot be obliterated except by some new process of calculation which shall diminish these damages. How was it occupied for military purposes? Under an order which subjected to that occupation every building, every close, all the private premises in the town of Decatur. I am told by one of the Senators from Alabama this morning that eight hundred people are not more than there are in Decatur. Confessedly, then, by this one order eight hundred people, if that be the number, were placed in the attitude of the claimant in this case, meritorious applicants for damages because the Army trod their fields and occupied their lands. There may be other causes of injury here. I am commenting upon this one, which is an integral part of that for which we are asked to award damages. Eight hundred people, if they are all loyal—and I think I shall fail in a very plain office of this argument if I do not convince the Senate that if this claim is to succeed upon the grounds upon which it is supported the circumstance of loyalty or disloyalty is wholly immaterial, of no more consequence than the dust in the scales—eight hundred people, then, are in the situation of this claimant, assuming now, for the moment, that they were loyal people, as she is said to be; and upon that case we are told that the Government is bound to make payment for her premises. Upon what principle? Upon the principle that it is the simple case of the Government taking for public use private property. Now, stop there a moment. All the facts in the case deny any such proposition. Why? Because, confessedly, a war existed to which the Government was a party on the one side. This was in the territory of the enemy, assuming that there was an enemy in the sense in which I now use that word; and the property was occupied during this war, in the progress of it, inasmuch that the honorable Senator from Indiana told us this morning that after this event took place, fighting, if I understood him, occurred at this very point, and these premises became useful as a position in a battle-field. Sir, is not that enough to show that as far as the east is from the west so far is this case from the ordinary case of a Government within its own peaceful domain appropriating to its own or a public use the property of one of its citizens? The learned and honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] answers no, and he refers the Senate to two cases which he thinks justify that answer.

Mr. President, I was not surprised at what the honorable Senator from Kentucky said. I was not surprised, although I know his acuteness, his learning, and his candor, because I long ago listened, in the other end of this Capitol, to arguments showing me how far those events which have aroused the feelings and the prejudices of us all have made their impression and warped what would seem to be the ordinary line of human judgment and mental vision. The honorable Senator thinks that the two cases which he cited cover this case, and afford not only an apology for it, but constrain the Senate, in honesty and propriety, to submit to this claim and acknowledge it.

The honorable Senator first discussed the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony, in 13 Howard; and I beg his attention and the attention of the Senate to the facts in that case. In 1845 Congress passed an act giving a drawback upon merchandise exported in the original packages to Santa Fé, in New Mexico, and Chihuahua, in Mexico. The act provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should make regulations under which it should be executed; and it became, as we all know, historically a part of the policy of the Government, in carrying on the Mexican war, to promote and encourage trade with the Mexicans in order to conciliate; expressing it otherwise, in order to demoralize and disintegrate the embodied sentiment against us. Section nine of this act imposed a forfeiture of the entire goods, and a fine, in addition, upon any man who should voluntarily bring them within the limits of the United States. Harmony was a trader, and on the 27th of May, 1846, he left Independence with what in the West would be called an outfit, consisting of goods imported under this law, and set out upon his mission toward Santa Fé. The act of the 18th of May, 1846, recognizing the Mexican war as existing, was not then known to Harmony or known at Independence, from which he started. This being the situation of things General Harney sent forward to stop all traders, this man with others. He did stop; and upon the command of the United States overtaking them he and others were permitted to go on and trade in the rear of the Army, and he did so. When they had advanced to within about three hundred miles of the town of Chihuahua, and were getting far into the enemy's country, where, I ought not to omit to say, Harmony had been authorized and encouraged to go, not only by the military authorities, not only by the Secretary of the Treasury, but, as the case shows, by the executive department itself—by the President. Having gone that far he sought to withdraw, to retrace his steps; and the commander at the last fort which they had passed issued an order that he should be compelled to continue with the Army, and that he should be compelled by force to continue with his property and his goods. Mitchell, the defendant below in the case, procured that order somewhat officiously, as the court seem to have thought, and executed it himself out of the ordinary course of things, it belonging appropriately to an officer inferior to him, and by force compelled this man, who was an American citizen, to proceed with the Army, it being destined upon a far-distant and perilous expedition against a town three hundred miles away. He did proceed; compelled to do so by force. The army on its march came upon the battle of Sacramento, which was fought, Harmony's wagons being used in the battle, and his mules being used and many of them killed. The battle over the army proceeded to the town of Chihuahua and occupied it, using his animals as far as they survived, his wagons, and his property. Chihuahua presently was abandoned, and the Mexicans coming there seized his property, confiscated it, and destroyed it. Harmony sued Mitchell for trespass, and Mitchell interposed five pleas, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. He pleaded—

- "1. That the plaintiff was engaged in trading with the enemy.
- "2. That he was compelled to remain with the American forces, and to move with them, to prevent the property from falling into the hands of the enemy.
- "3. That the property was taken for public use.
- "4. That if the defendant was liable for the original taking he was released from damages for its subsequent loss by the act of the plaintiff, who had resumed the possession and control of it before the loss happened.
- "5. That the defendant acted in obedience to the order of his commanding officer, and therefore is not liable."

The cause was tried in the circuit court of the southern district of New York, and the circuit judge virtually directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The exceptions arose upon the direction or charge of the judge. The jury rendered a verdict of ninety thousand and some odd dollars against Mitchell for this trespass. The Senate will see that the question presented to the Supreme Court was simply whether that judgment should be affirmed or not. The honorable Senator from Kentucky cautioned us against mistaking the rambling dissertations of a court for the decision in a particular case. I was glad to hear it from him. I have always wished that the distinction might be observed. I wished it in the Dred Scott case. When the court commenced by determining that Dred Scott was not in court at all, was not a citizen and could not be there, and having determined that, proceeded to deliver the oracles of the Democratic party, I always regarded it in that case, if I may be permitted to say so, as entitled to no more respect than the sloppings over of a court in any other case. I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from Kentucky that it behooves us to look at the point in judgment, to look at what the court had a right to decide, in order to measure the effect of the decision.

What question had the Supreme Court to decide in the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony? The circuit judge had charged the jury below, virtually, that this was a trespass on the part of Mitchell. He had charged the jury, among other things, that to have taken this property under the color of right there must have been some great public exigency pressing at the moment, but that this man had himself, as a volunteer—that word appears in the opinion, I think—obtained an order from his superior to compel the claimant, under duress, to remain with an army destined upon a far distant adventure, perilous and unnecessary, in the sense of self-preservation; and that, in thus compelling him, he had been guilty of an asportation of his property where it was harmless, from where it was safe, from where the plaintiff with his property had a right to be, to a far distant scene of violence where his property was destroyed. That the court below charged; that the jury, in substance, found; and that the Supreme Court of the United States said appeared to be true in law and in fact; and the whole court concurred except Mr. Justice Daniel, who dissented on the ground solely that the circuit judge had trenchanted upon the functions of the jury by expressing his opinion upon matters of fact.

Now, Mr. President, what has that case to do with this? What can it have to do with it in any aspect? Even if the court had traveled out of the record to give public instructions upon a question like this would it have any force as a decision? I know that in the opinion of the court it is said that undoubtedly an exigency may exist in which a public officer, in which a military officer, perhaps the expression is, may seize property under such circumstances that the Government will clearly be liable; but the court say this is no such case, and therefore it is not necessary to speculate upon that. That is the case of Mitchell vs. Harmony, the case of a citizen authorized by an act of Congress to do a specific thing, held under the rigors of a section which provided that if he voluntarily came into the United States with his property it should be forfeited and he should be fined; a man who had in addition to that the assent not only of the present military authorities but of the executive department of the United States behind them and behind him for what he was doing; a man who sought to remain where his property would have been safe, where the courts say the jury was well warranted in finding there was no danger of its falling into the hands of the enemy; wishing to remain there, he was compelled by the force of the defendant to submit to being transported with his property to another and a distant field, where it was destroyed; and that the jury and the court concurred in thinking was a trespass for which the defendant, Mitchell, must pay. Now, sir, if I am to vote Miss Sue Murphy's claim I must find some broader and better apology than is afforded to me by the case to which I have referred.

The honorable Senator referred also to the case of Grant, in the Court of Claims. What was that case? It occurred in the court in October, 1863. The alleged destruction of property was on the 15th of July, 1861, and the first proclamation of the President declaring any community or any territory insurrectionary was on the 1st of July, 1862—a year afterward, lacking fifteen days. The occurrences discussed in that case took place in Arizona, and that Territory and the people of that Territory were never declared by any proclamation to be in insurrection. I have gone far enough, I think, to show that it has no relation, however remote, to a question like this. That was the case simply as to which the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] read an authority from Vattel the other day. The very words which he read are incorporated in the opinion. It was the simple case of the Government taking the property of a citizen within the country in its ordinary peaceful sense; and, as everybody will see who reads the opinion of the court, the question which we are discussing here played no part whatever in it. The judge quotes from Vattel that if the Government takes the property of a citizen by way of precaution, even though his Government at the time is engaged in a war, if beforehand and in the acknowledged dominions and jurisdiction of his Government his property is taken, it is the ordinary case of a citizen who has a claim because his property has been taken for public use. That I need not be mistaken in that assertion, I will call the attention of the Senate very briefly to what the court say in the case, and particularly I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it crops out accidentally, in the latter part of the opinion, that Judge Wilnot had especially in his mind the distinction between this Territory which remained in its ordinary condition and an insurrectionary State or district, because he says:

"The necessity to us appears to have been urgent, the danger impending. Texas, adjoining New Mexico, of which Arizona was then a part, was in flagrant rebellion."

That was the use which he was making of this fact that there was nigh to or adjacent an insurrectionary State, and because of that and other facts to which he refers an imminent exigency existed which furnished to this man, if I may so speak, his power of attorney or his warrant to do what he did with this property. What does the court say?

"Every elementary writer of authority sustains the views here taken of the duty and obligation of States."

And he quotes from Vattel:

"When a sovereign disposes of the possessions of a community or an individual the alienation will be valid. But justice requires that this community or this individual be indemnified at the public charge."

And then the judge quotes the precise language read the other day by the Senator from West Virginia; and upon that ground he awards a certain sum of money as the damages in this instance. Sir, has that anything to do with the question before us? I submit, with great respect, that it has nothing in the world to do with it, unless you obliterate from this case the fact that Alabama and her people had been declared to be in insurrection and no act or declaration to the contrary had ever taken place. If you obliterate that, if you make it the case of property taken in the State of New York by a law to erect a fort upon it; property taken as a ship lying in the harbor of New York to go out on the seas and fight the battle against the rebellion; then I admit it has application, and then I also admit that it is wholly unnecessary to resort to it, because nothing is better settled, I take it, in the jurisprudence of perhaps I might say all countries than the proposition for which it would be cited.

What is the distinction? What was the distinction in 1867, when this body deliberately put it in the form of an enactment? The act of February 21, 1867, declares expressly, and in the broadest and most searching language—I was surprised to find it so broad—that the Court of Claims shall take no jurisdiction, shall entertain no question whatever arising out of a claim for real estate, for personal property, for injury to either, for damage of any kind occasioned during the rebellion in any State whatever or in any part of any State. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that there his distinction is met—in any State or any part of any State which has been declared to be in insurrection. What did the Senate mean by that? What did the Congress of the United States mean by drawing a line too deep and distinct to be crossed between the claims of those residing in the adhering States, as they used to be called, and those residing in the States which went off with what a great judge called a unilateral declaration of war, and attempted to establish an independent sovereignty? Does the statute say that if they be loyal and reside there their claims may be entertained? Does the act say that if the Army has reached so far, and for the moment has a possessio pedis of the particular property, there is the scene from which a meritorious claim may come or a claim to be entertained? No, sir; no such distinction as that; but taking the distinction referred to by the Senator from Michigan, referred to by the Supreme Court, and vindicated so far as that court is concerned until it shall be overthrown—referring to that distinction, and that alone, Congress has said that in no case whatever can any claimant from one of the insurrectionary States be so meritorious that his claim is to be entertained even or discussed in the appropriate tribunal.

Mr. President, suppose we depart from this; suppose we follow the honorable Senator from Kentucky; let me ask you to consider what follows. I say—and I say it after questions have been propounded here inviting its refutation, inviting all Senators to point out the distinction—that no distinction can be found, none whatever, in law or principle between this case and those countless instances of injury which occurred during the march of Sherman and during every other march that took place while the rebellion raged. I do not mean, I beg to say to the honorable Senator from West Virginia, to include in this statement lawless acts of individuals, unauthorized trespasses committed by the members or the followers of Sherman's army; but I insist that every authorized act of the occupation or the appropriation of property which occurred between Atlanta and the sea is upon all fours, as to loyal citizens at least—and I want in a moment to discuss that distinction, if it exists properly—with the case before us. Every battle, every siege, every march, every encampment, every bivouac, every parade since the war began, unless it happened upon the public highways or upon the scanty reserved property of the United States, brought into existence its brood of claims like this. Why not? Says the honorable Senator from Kentucky, to illustrate, property is prostrated to gave range to guns. Yes, sir. One of the most striking marks of destruction that I saw during the war, because it was among the first, were the green trees at Arlington felled in midsummer to give range to the guns. Everywhere that took place. Everywhere standing timber was felled to make fires, and for other uses. The rails were taken from fences to be used at the bivouac. Stacks, granaries, animals were taken; but above all, and most necessary of all, in the language of the bill before us, the land was "occupied for military purposes." Yes, sir, the iron heel of war went over it. What distinction is there between those cases and this? I have not come now, bear in mind, to what are called in the books accidental or incidental cases, where a random or an intentional shot destroys a building or kills an animal in the progress of a battle. I am speaking of those intentional, those precautionary acts, if you please, which fall within everybody's definition.

I have no wish either, any more than the honorable Senator from Indiana, to resort to questions of amount in order to evade questions of moral obligation; but is it not proper that the Senate should pause when we see here, after full discussion, in a case avowedly presented as a test, that we are in danger of establishing a precedent which will usher in demands great enough to beggar any nation?

I shall be answered—and I must not forget that—that we have a breakwater in the distinction between loyal and disloyal persons, and that claims like this are to be presented only by those, perhaps only by the few, in the southern States who clung to the flag during the rebellion. I affirm, sir, upon deliberation, (and I have ventured to invite the attention of Senators to it,) that no distinction whatever is to be found upon the argument presented to us between Sue Murphey as she is and Sue Murphey as she would be had she been a non-combatant rebel. First of all, if there were a distinction in law it would vanish as matter of fact. Who doubts that every claimant who comes here, particularly every woman, every non-combatant can show that she was loyal during the rebellion? It reduces itself to a state of mind in the case of non-combatants; a state of mind is all there is of it; and in point of fact every claimant who comes, if there be such a distinction, will be able to show, past our finding out to the contrary, that loyalty is one of the elements of the case.

But, Mr. President, what has loyalty or disloyalty to do with the test of this question at all? The honorable Senator from Indiana said he thought it was not fair to present a case different from that before us. I submit to him that it is fair in order to test the principle. It is fair in order to show that this argument proves entirely too much, and that therefore it is unsound. Now let us see. Was Sue Murphey a citizen because of her loyalty? Will anybody say that? Was her citizenship distinguished from that of any other person on account of her loyalty? Suppose her prayers and her hopes had been with "the lost cause," would that have quenched her citizenship? I should like to hear an argument made to show that. The argument is that because this claimant is a citizen and because her property was taken for public use, ergo, compensation is to be made. Is not that as true of one citizen as another? Why is it true of any citizen? Because the Constitution affirms it. Suppose you pass a statute saying that disloyal citizens shall not be paid; if this argument is sound they will read the Constitution to you, and the statute goes down because it is palpably in violation of that provision of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, if it be true that this case is determined and concluded by that provision of organic law which says that compensation shall be made for private property, will some Senator tell me the distinction to be drawn between the case of Miss Murphey and some other woman living next door to her despoiled of her property by the same act? Suppose that Miss Murphey daily prayed for the success of the Union Army, and her neighbor daily prayed for the success of the confederate forces, will any lawyer tell me that, if the question is disposed of upon the principle that compensation must be made to citizens for property taken, a distinction can be drawn between the two cases that I have cited?

The Supreme Court said, in the prize cases, in so many words, that although every inhabitant of these insurrectionary districts became a public enemy, he did not become a foreigner or an alien; and the honorable Senator from Indiana argued this morning that the citizenship remained. Certainly it did. The ordinances of secession were void. They were citizens in rebellion against their Government, but still citizens. And now, I repeat, what becomes of the question of loyalty or disloyalty as the element in such a case? I affirm that, if this argument be true, it is beyond the power of Congress to establish any such distinction. The Constitution is paramount, and would move on as unchecked in its course in this regard if we should interpose a statute setting up such a distinction as it does now in the absence of any statute.

Thus let us look this question in the face. If the argument proves anything it proves that all persons whatsoever who were citizens of the United States are entitled to compensation for every loss they sustained in such wise as the loss was occasioned here or in any wise legally similar to it. Can that be true, sir? If it is, we are in a more unfortunate condition than was suggested some time ago by the acting President of the United States. He sent us a communication broadly intimating to the nations of the earth that if we had conquered and because we had conquered the rebels of the South, we had absorbed their assets to us and thus became liable to all mankind for their public pecuniary engagements. Well, that was rather a startling discovery to the Senate and the country; but it was a discovery limited in its importance compared to this. Such a sum is a pigmy compared to that amount now due, we are told now, upon any theory of generosity; not due upon any theory of protection; not due upon any equity or flexible rule which may be waived or may be discretionary in some sense or degree, but absolutely due as matter of strict right according to the law and the fundamental law of the Republic.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the question of the attitude, the legal character of the claimant in this case, was a point necessarily and legally, and in fact submitted to the Supreme Court, elaborately argued, and completely determined in many important cases, inasmuch as that decision is fortified by history and commends itself at least in its bearings upon this and similar cases, I do not view it now otherwise. I prefer to stand upon the determination made by the highest judicial tribunal. I prefer that to trying the experiment against the legislation of Congress, against what seem to me the laws of reason, against this decision of the Supreme Court, and against the interests, indeed, I think, in favor of the destruction, financially, of the country. I prefer, I say, to stand upon this decision, upon the doctrine that it holds; and if the Senator from Kentucky, or others, be discontented with it, let the question be made again in the Supreme Court; let it be argued. Let us at least wait until time and reflection have cast more doubt upon it. But in no event, it seems to me, ought we to rush, in defiance of our own action, in defiance of the logic which has been held by every Department of the Government, to the adoption of a measure which is to let in innumerable cases, and to charge to the public account an indebtedness which, if it is just and obligatory, I agree that we are bound to recognize, but an indebtedness which I think no financier has yet devised the means to pay.

Now, sir, I have nothing to say about Miss Murphey personally. I will concede, for the sake of the argument, all that was said in such glowing terms by the honorable Senator from Kentucky; but that has nothing to do with this question. It is wholly an impersonal question. No matter how she spells her name, nor to what sex she belongs, the question is whether she has a standing legally before us, and presents a claim which, looking as we are bound to look, for those considerations controlling trustees administering trust funds, obliges us to pay her. That is the question.

To my mind—and I appreciate that assertion adds nothing to argument—nothing can be clearer than that this case is obviously beyond the limits to which we ought to go, or to which legally we can go; and if I evince less zeal in its discussion than was evinced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I beg to assure him that I feel quite as much in earnest in its bearings as he or any other Senator can feel, although his argument may be made rosy by the compliments which he pays to the particular person in whose behalf the argument is made.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate, before this claim is allowed, will find some authority which cannot be found between the lids of those books that have been read to us, and some justification which, to my appreciation, has not yet been suggested.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it seems strange to hear Senators insist that this claimant, in the eye of the law, is not technically an enemy, that her property is not technically enemy property, and subject to all the incidents of being such. The importance of determining correctly this question is that we may decide, not whether Miss Sue Murphey shall be paid, but to settle the grave issue whether the Government is under the legal obligation to pay this vast class of claims. Without detaining the Senate, let me remind them of the direct declarations of our Supreme Court. In 2 Wallace the Chief Justice says:

"We must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies."

The court adudge, whatever we may say, that all the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies. This was an adjudication, not a dictum, because it was insisted in that case, as it is in this, that the particular individual by reason of her loyalty was not to be regarded as an enemy. The Supreme Court have decided the very question of law upon which we as Senators are now called to vote.

Again, in 2 Black, in the prize cases, the Supreme Court said:

"All persons residing within this territory whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power are in this contest liable to be treated as enemies, though they are not foreigners. The products of the soil of the hostile territory, as well as other property engaged in the commerce of the hostile power, as the source of its wealth and strength, are always regarded as legitimate prize without regard to the domicile of the owner, and much more so if he reside and trade within their territory."

The case we are considering is one where the property is within enemy territory and the claimant is a resident in enemy territory. So, in determining whether the United States are under a legal obligation to pay this claim, this is the strongest case that can be put on the part of the Government. If we are liable in this we are liable in every case.

What is the answer given to these adjudications; the only one that has been attempted? It is that given by the Senator from West Virginia, to wit, that the decisions referred to only mean that the rights of the claimant were postponed during the continuance of the war, and when peace returns then the former enemy may come forward and claim compensation for what occurred during the period of war. That answer does not merit reply, because when enemy property is seized it is condemned, sold, and the proceeds finally disposed of, and there is the end of the whole controversy.

The declarations of the elementary books on the subject are as clear as the decisions of the court. Vattel says:

"Civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect: it produces in the nation two independent parties who consider each other as enemies and acknowledge no common judge."

And to break the force of that declaration we are referred to another paragraph in Vattel which has nothing whatever to do with the case in hand; the learned writer is considering the obligations of a government as to its own citizens in its own friendly territory, and considers two different conditions: first, where the damage is done by the State itself; second, where it is done by the enemy. All, however, in the States own friendly territory. Where the damage is done by the State two classes of cases are considered: one, the case of the State taking land within its own friendly territory for a fortification; then the State should give compensation. The other class of cases is where all the incidental consequences of the war, even in the friendly territory, are to be sustained by the citizen without compensation, as where a house is raked down by the artillery in retaking a town which the enemy had taken. Where the damages are done in the friendly territory by the enemy the learned author holds that there is no obligation whatever on the part of the Government to compensate its own citizens for damage sustained. But all this is matter entirely outside of this question. No authority has been or can be adduced the world over to show that any government is under an obligation to pay for the results of war in the enemy's territory.

Resort is had to another principle of law which I think has failed most signally; it has fallen of its own weight. It has been urged by the Senator from Indiana, and also by the Senator from Kentucky, that we are under obligations to give compensation for the property of Miss Murphey under the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution; that this was a taking of private property for public use for which just compensation should be made. Let us read the Constitution, omitting what is unnecessary;

"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

If the latter provision applies the first does, and we cannot take life, liberty, or property during a war without due process of law; you must have a court, a warrant, and a judgment before you can lawfully shoot a rebel. Why, sir, it is not only a maxim of law, it is also a fundamental government principle that "the law is silent amid arms." To give compensation for property taken there must be an adjudication. What tribunal has ever been created to determine upon the compensation that should be received by any one whose property should be taken? The property is taken, as I have before said, under the right of self-preservation and the right of necessity; under the military or martial law.

The provision of the Constitution referred to cannot be invoked in time of war even within the friendly territory of the Government. Suppose the United States in war wanted a thousand barrels of flour and should go to the owner, seek to purchase it and fail, and should then seize and take it, would the Government by so doing violate the Constitution? Certainly not. It would not be a "taking" under the Constitution. No law has provided any tribunal to adjudge what should be the compensation for the flour, and it would be an absurdity to create such a tribunal. The Government would pay for the flour as a matter of expediency, of policy, and of justice so clear as to create a right in the citizen to receive compensation. But it is not a right under the provision of the Constitution referred to. His right to compensation rests on the justice of his claim, and on that alone. This provision of the Constitution and the argument made by the two Senators based upon it has therefore no relation whatever to this subject.

The advocates of this measure defeated in the law now have resort to a skillful handling of the facts of the case; and they tell us, first, that the property was not located in enemy territory. We know that Alabama was enemy territory in 1864 in fact. We know it was so in law de jure by the proclamation of the President, and that the property was situated in Alabama. And now I call the attention of the Senate to the view of the Supreme Court upon the very point whether a mere temporary occupation by our troops changes the status of the State. The Chief Justice, in the Alexander cotton case, (2 Wallace,) says:

"There can be no doubt, we think, that this was enemy's property. The military occupation by the national military forces was too limited, too imperfect, too brief, and too precarious to change the enemy relation created for the country and its inhabitants by three years of continuous rebellion, interrupted at last for a few weeks, but immediately renewed and ever since maintained."

If the locality had not been recaptured and retaken by the enemy at the end of those three weeks it would have made no difference. The occupation by our troops was too recent, too partial, too uncertain. The subsequent event in this case that our troops continued, after a fight, to hold the locality, does not change the character the territory possessed when Sherman first arrived and built this fortification. Events are to be judged at the time and in the relations that they occur.

But the court goes further, and says that—

"All the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until, by action of the Legislature and the Executive, or otherwise, the relation is thoroughly and permanently changed."

Now, who will insist that the State of Alabama, or Decatur, the locality in question, where it was necessary to take this property for a fortification, and where there was afterward fighting between the rebels and our forces for possession, was in such a position that at the time Miss Murphey's property was taken the relations of that State, or of that part of the State, were thoroughly and permanently changed? It was enemy territory.

Mr. ANTHONY. Our occupation never ceased.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know how that is. The subsequent events do not change the status of the locality when it was seized. The point is, whether at the time the occupation of this locality was made it was "enemy territory." One cannot be made a wrongdoer by events that occur or do not occur weeks after the act being considered was done and completed.

Another point is taken on the facts of the case, namely, that this property was taken for the use of the Army, and is therefore distinguishable from all other classes of claims for the destruction of property. I submit that there is no proper distinction between the use made of this property and the damage which was done generally to the property of the South. This was the property of a loyal lady taken for the erection of a fortification. A few doors from her is another house belonging to another loyal citizen, and this is taken for the occupation of our troops, and is by them injured. Another house of a loyal citizen it is necessary to tear down that our artillery may have free play. The cattle of another are driven off to keep them from being used for the support of the enemy.

Mr. President, property that is destroyed in the enemy's country to weaken the enemy is just as truly devoted to the use of the nation as is that which is taken and used to strengthen and support our own forces. There is no difference.

In the fall of 1864 General Grant ordered General Hunter to enter the Shenandoah valley, and, using the words of the order, "to take all provisions, forage, and stock wanted for the use of your command, and that such as you cannot consume destroy." The Army marched through that beautiful valley, ravaged all their fields, and destroyed their crops. Afterward, in October, I think, Sheridan marched through, and reported that he had burned two thousand barns filled with grain; had burned seventy mills filled with flour; that he had taken four thousand head of cattle, and three or four thousand head of sheep, and a large number of horses, and that he had laid that whole valley waste. According to the doctrine insisted on that which the troops could not in their wasteful use consume, is not to be compensated for, but that which they could so consume we are to pay for. Was not that which was destroyed so that rebels could not harbor in that valley devoted to a public use as well as that which was prodigally consumed? Whatever weakens the enemy is taken for purposes of war just as much as what strengthens our own forces. Whoever before heard the doctrine avowed that a nation must pay for what it used in an enemy's country? It is sustained by no authority.

Here I leave this subject. The truth is, war is a terrible calamity, and all the people have felt its burdens; and are we to step in now and say that the southern loyalists alone shall be exempt from its inflictions? Have they done more than their duty? The North have been lavish in their expenditure of blood and treasure, and are now borne down by taxation. The Congress of the United States should hesitate long before making all the evils which naturally fall upon the whole country the burden of the tax-paying portion of the nation. It is contrary to law and it is contrary to justice.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, there used to be a saying when I was a boy that some things could be done as well as others. It seems to me that some things can be done a great deal better than others if, as my gallant friend from Kentucky said the other day, there happens to be a fair lady in the case. Now, I happen to know that there is a case before the Committee on Claims of this nature: the citizens of Loudoun county, or a portion of the citizens of Loudoun county, Virginia, came to the House of Representatives last session with a bill asking for damages to the extent of over $250,000 for property taken by General Sheridan in his passage through the valley. That bill passed the House and came here to the Senate, and was lost just at the last hour of the session, I believe through the influence of the Senator from Iowa. Those people were perfectly loyal. They are Quakers, non-combatants. When the question of secession was agitated in Virginia they opposed it; and when the act passed they were seized, many of them, and put into prison in Richmond. One of the claimants who came here last session and asked damages was a colonel in the Union Army; his old gray-headed father, a man of great intelligence and integrity, was taken from his home and hung by the rebels; and then the Union officers took his property and used it for the Army; and that man, with others, came here and asked to be remunerated for the losses which he and they suffered, and as yet we have refused to listen to their request.

I know, sir, of another instance. When Early made his attack upon the city of Washington the rebels entered a house just out of Seventh street, some two or three miles beyond the suburbs of the city, entered the second and third stories, fired upon our troops, and President Lincoln, who happened to be there at the time, ordered our soldiers to fire hot shot into that building, and they did so, and destroyed it. Mr. Lay, the owner of the house, came to the War Department and asked damages, and they were refused.

These cases certainly are as strong as the case which has been brought before the Senate by the Committee on Claims. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a matter of great importance. Shall we establish a precedent; because if we do we must pay all the other claims that will come before Congress.

I have another instance in mind. There was a Mr. Graham, who did business in the city of New Orleans at the time the war broke out, although himself a resident of Boston, in Massachusetts. When the war broke out he fled from New Orleans to Boston, but his partner being a lame man, and not liable to military duty, remained in the city and carried on the business. Months after the Union forces had taken possession of New Orleans, and when the city was under the command of General Banks, Mr. Graham returned to New Orleans, and then, by a general order issued by General Banks, one hundred and fourteen barrels of sugar belonging to Mr. Graham were taken for the use of the Army. He came here to the War Department and asked to be paid for the loss of that sugar which was appropriated by the United States Government to the use of the Army, and was refused. It cannot be said that that was taken in enemy country or enemy's territory, because it was under our own flag, and we had a military governor in New Orleans at that very moment.

There is another instance of a gentleman at Mobile, a loyal man, who was taken by the rebels after the war broke out and put in prison and his property confiscated; he was afterward liberated by the rebels, but refusing to give any aid or comfort to the rebel cause he was again imprisoned, and finally securing his liberty, and the rebels having paid him in confederate money for the property which they had confiscated, in order to save a little from the wreck of his fortune he purchased a draft of $15,000 upon the Bank of New Orleans in this rebel money. He could not get to New Orleans until after the city was taken by our forces; and when he went there to get his draft cashed he found that the money had been confiscated and covered into the United States Treasury. He prepared his case and put it on file at the Department, and he has not got a dollar from that day to this. He was a thoroughly loyal man.

Mr. ANTHONY. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the Senator think the man ought to have that money? Is he not entitled to it?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The question is whether, in a time of war, he being in a State that is in rebellion and where the work of putting down the rebellion is not completed, he is not in the same condition with the rebels themselves.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator one other question, and that is, on what grounds the War Department refused to pay for the sugar that was taken in New Orleans?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I believe there was a resolution or an act passed by Congress that such cases should not be settled, and the Departments refused to settle them. Now the question is whether Congress here shall vary from this rule which has been established and allow the claim of Miss Murphey. I cannot see that her claim is any stronger than the case of Mr. Graham, whose sugar was taken and appropriated to the use of the Army.

Mr. FOWLER. Was it not rather on the ground that there had been no legislation on the subject, and that therefore there was no authority in the War Department to make the allowance?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I know that in one case that came to my personal knowledge, of a lady whose property had been taken by the direction of General Sherman, and who came here for damages for the loss of the property, the War Department refused to allow the claim on the ground that Congress had forbidden the allowance of those claims, and I suppose this was upon the same ground. This lady was a perfectly loyal lady like Miss Murphey. She was a friend, and, I believe, a relative of Mr. Stockton, the former Chaplain of the House of Representatives. Her property was all swept away by the authority of the commander-in-chief of the loyal forces. She was not able to get one dollar in damages for the loss of her property. It is a parallel case with this. Now, the question is whether we shall establish a precedent in the case of Sue Murphey which will cover millions, will swamp the Government, will bankrupt the country.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not wish to disturb my honorable friend, but I ask him to allow me the courtesy of putting a question to him.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, or the honorable Senator from Michigan, or the honorable Senator from New Jersey, or the honorable Senator from New York, to tell the Senate distinctly upon what law they rely to authorize the taking of this property of Miss Sue Murphey.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I suppose that in time of war, under military law, either party to the war has a right to take property in order to carry forward the objects of the war. It is under military law.

Mr. DAVIS. Will my honorable friend indulge me in another question? I concede that in a war between nations, for instance, a war between the United States and Great Britain, if the property of a subject of Great Britain is found in the United States, Congress may pass a law to confiscate that property, which would authorize its seizure and the dispossession of the owner; but I ask the honorable Senator from New Hampshire if the property of the present President of the United States, who was a citizen of the State of Tennessee, or the property of Judge Wayne, who was a citizen of the State of Georgia, those men being within the Union lines and having property here, was subjected to be seized during the war as the property of Sue Murphey was in the State of Alabama? I will thank the honorable Senator to answer me that question.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The case which the Senator has put is parallel to the case of Mr. Graham, which I have already stated, and I know no reason why Andrew Johnson should be treated otherwise than Mr. Graham was treated, especially when the War Department, which is under his supervision, has refused to pay Mr. Graham for the property which was taken that belonged to him. And now I will ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. I want to know if the property of Andrew Johnson had been destroyed by a battle during the war in Tennessee he could claim of the United States Government damages for the loss of his property during that battle?

Mr. DAVIS. My honorable friend, with the adroitness of his section, evades my question and puts another question to me. [Laughter.] He does not answer my question as I put it at all. The question that I put to my most respected friend was whether the property of Andrew Johnson or of Judge Wayne, within the District of Columbia, could be seized here by the authorities of the United States for military purposes as Miss Murphey's property in Alabama was seized?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not think that the case put is parallel to the case of Miss Murphey, because that was in enemy's territory and the District of Columbia is not and never has been—

Mr. DAVIS. Now, if my honorable friend will permit me, I will put another question to him?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The gentleman can occupy the floor if he pleases. I have said all that I wish to say.

Mr. DAVIS. Go on, sir; I beg pardon.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. No, sir; I have no further remarks to make.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am obliged to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire for his courtesy in having given me the floor. I shall not abuse that courtesy nor the patience of the Senate beyond a few minutes. The question that I put to the honorable Senator was most pertinent. Andrew Johnson was resident in the District of Columbia during a portion of the period of the war, and he was a citizen of the State of Tennessee. Judge Wayne was a citizen of the State of Georgia, and was a resident of the District of Columbia during the whole period of the war. The question which I propounded to my honorable friend, though no more to him than to the other gentlemen who assume his position, was whether the property of Andrew Johnson and of Judge Wayne situate within the District of Columbia was subject to be seized by the authorities of the United States. If my honorable friend, or any other gentleman, will give me a categorical answer to that question, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose the interrogatory of the honorable Senator from Kentucky includes me as well as the honorable Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for a categorical answer.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understand the question it is this—

Mr. DAVIS. I give way for the Senator from Michigan to give a categorical answer to my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. That is what I propose to do, Mr. President, if I am able. The question is, if I understand it rightly, whether the property of Andrew Johnson, he being a citizen of Tennessee, and that property being situated not in Tennessee, but in the District of Columbia, was subject to forfeiture upon the ground that he was a public enemy, being a citizen of Tennessee, as the Senator from Kentucky says. Do I state it correctly?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. I included Judge Wayne, also.

Mr. HOWARD. That is very easily answered, then, it seems to me, by putting another question, whether the District of Columbia was hostile or enemy country, whether it was declared to be in insurrection under a statute of the United States and a proclamation of the President of the United States? I take it the honorable Senator from Kentucky can answer that question. Certainly no such state of things existed in the District of Columbia, and the property of Mr. Johnson, if he had had any here, would have been as secure as the property of any other person against military seizure.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the honorable Senator's answer to my question I comprehend; but I comprehend its error and not its truth; and for this reason: the honorable Senators who oppose the passage of this bill assume the ground that the law of nations which regulates the rights and the liabilities of citizens and subjects of nations at war with each other applies to the case of the insurrection of some of the people of the southern States against the Government of the United States. The honorable Senator from Michigan answers the question so as to abandon that ground. If a declaration of war was to be made by the Congress of the United States against Great Britain to-morrow, and there were subjects of Great Britain resident, as there are thousands, in the United States, it would be competent for Congress immediately to pass a law confiscating the property of every subject of Great Britain who was resident anywhere in the United States.

Now, the honorable Senator admits that if Andrew Johnson had property in this District so long as he remained in this District his property would be as secure as the property of any other citizen in the District. Sir, no such qualification or exception as that applies to public enemies. No such qualification or exception as that can apply to the subjects or citizens of any country with which the United States are at war, because every subject of any foreign country with which the United States are at war, resident anywhere in the United States, though he may have millions of property, holds that property subject to confiscation by a law of Congress whenever Congress chooses to pass such a law.

Now, I will present this principle in another aspect to the honorable Senators. A mere declaration of war by the Congress of the United States with England would not of itself produce such a confiscation of the property of subjects of England resident in our country. There is a case of Brown vs. The United States, in which that was expressly ruled by Chief Justice Marshall many years ago. That case embraced these facts: a subject of England was in the United States at the time of the embargo and the declaration of the war of 1812; under the force and effect of the act of Congress simply declaring war his property was libeled and seized by the action of the district attorney for the district in which he resided; the circuit court, held by Mr. Justice Story, decided that the declaration of war of its own force amounted to a confiscation of the property of all enemies resident in the United States. From that judgment an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the case was heard, most elaborately argued, and Chief Justice Marshall decided that the declaration of war had no effect whatever to confiscate the property unless in the act declaring war there were provisions expressly and exclusively declaring the confiscation. That is the law. I refer gentlemen to that case, Brown vs. The United States, reported in 8 Cranch, page 128. The court decided that property in its possession and in its title remains in an alien enemy resident in the United States until an act of Congress, in addition to the declaration of war, has been passed declaring that property to be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. President, on the principle of national law which the gentlemen apply to this case, and which I say, in defiance of any intimations of opinion by the Supreme Court, has no application to the case at all, but admitting that it has full, proper, and authentic application, what are the consequences? If Andrew Johnson was a citizen of Tennessee, though resident in the District of Columbia; if Justice Wayne, a citizen of Georgia, resident in the District of Columbia; if both, or either of them, had property here, according to the inevitable, necessary, imperative consequences of this principle, the property of both those men would be liable to be seized under an act of Congress passed to confiscate it, because that is the doctrine and that is the principle which applies to alien enemies everywhere. I now meet gentlemen upon their own principle; I meet them upon the legitimate consequences of their own principle. Take Sue Murphey and all the citizens of Alabama to have been alien enemies, without regard to their loyalty—a position so monstrous that I utterly reject it in my own judgment—but take that to be true, there was no law except the general law of war that applies in time of peace, and as much in time of peace as in time of war, to authorize that commander to have taken this property.

If the gentlemen's premises are true, I concede that Congress has the power to pass a law to confiscate her property and the property of all other citizens. The question then arises, has Congress passed such a law? I will read one or two passages from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Brown vs. The United States:

"There being no other act of Congress which bears on the subject, it is considered as proved that the Legislature has not confiscated enemy property which was within the United States at the declaration of war, and that this sentence of condemnation cannot be sustained."

It was that question that the case went upon. The circuit court had declared in favor of the confiscation of the property upon the ground that the declaration of war, of its own terms and effect, produced a confiscation. That judgment was appealed from upon the ground that the declaration of war produced no such result, but that it required a special act confiscating the property of alien enemies that might be found in the United States; and Chief Justice Marshall, after elaborate and able argument, in a most well-considered and luminous opinion, decided that until this act of confiscation was passed by Congress the possession of the property and the title to the property both remained with the alien enemy resident in the United States. Now, I ask gentlemen to produce an act of Congress to confiscate the property of the loyal men within the rebel States, or loyal women, either. There is no such act. I will read from the two acts of confiscation:

"That if, during the present or any future insurrection against the Government of the United States, after the President of the United States shall have declared, by proclamation, that the laws of the United States are opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the power vested in the marshals by law, any person or persons, his, her, or their agent, attorney, or employé, who shall purchase or acquire, sell or give, any property of whatsoever kind or description, with intent to use or employ the same, or suffer the same to be used or employed in aiding, abetting, or promoting such insurrection or resistance to the laws, or any person or persons engaged therein; or if any person or persons, being the owner or owners of any such property, shall knowingly use or employ, or consent to the use or employment of the same, as aforesaid, all such property is hereby declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found; and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the same to be seized, confiscated, and condemned."

That act was passed in August, 1861. It confiscates only the property that is employed in the assistance of the rebel cause. Now, before the property of Sue Murphey could be forfeited to the United States, and before it could be taken possession of by any officer, civil or military, in the name, by the authority, and as the property of the United States, it must be shown that the property had been used in the rebel service. There is no such proof in this case, and no pretense of it.

Here is another act that touches the subject of confiscation, but that does not cover this case at all, or any case analogous to it—the act of August 17, 1862:

"That if any person within any State or Territory of the United States, other than those named as aforesaid, after the passage of this act, being engaged in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States, or aiding or abetting such rebellion, shall not, within sixty days after public warning and proclamation duly given and made by the President of the United States, cease to aid, countenance, and abet such rebellion, and return to his allegiance to the United States, all the estate and property, moneys, stocks, and credits of such person shall be liable to seizure, as aforesaid; and it shall be the duty of the President to seize and use them as aforesaid or the proceeds thereof; and all sales, transfers, or conveyances of any such property after the expiration of the said sixty days from the date of such warning and proclamation shall be null and void; and it shall be a sufficient bar to any suit brought by such person for the possession or the use of such property, or any of it, to allege and prove that he is one of the persons described in this section."

These are all the acts of confiscation, according to my recollection, that Congress has passed. What do they amount to? What case do they cover? What property do they declare to be forfeited? Only such property as is perverted to the use of the rebel cause, to the promotion of the success of the rebel cause, or the property of persons engaged in the rebellion, and they do not cover even that property if the owners of that property cease to act with the rebels within the time named in the law.

Mr. President, there is no law, public or statutory, national or domestic, to the United States, that authorized the seizure of this property of Sue Murphey. Until that property was declared by an act of Congress to be confiscated to the United States its title remained in Miss Murphey. It was there under the protection of the laws which protect the property of all citizens, and the invasion of that property by a military officer, or by any civil officer of the Government of the United States, was nothing but a simple and an illegal trespass upon the rights of the owner.

Sir, if gentlemen desire to establish an analogy between citizens of the States which did not go into the rebellion and citizens of States where the rebellion prevailed, and if that analogy exists under the national law, they have no right to confiscate the property of any citizen in the States that did go into the rebellion until an act of Congress has been passed declaring that such confiscation shall take place.

The honorable Senator from Michigan and the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, when they concede that the property of Andrew Johnson or Mr. Justice Wayne, situated within this District, would have been as secure in the ownership and possession of those men while they remained within the Union lines as the property of any other citizen, concede the whole of the case that is now under consideration; they concede a principle that covers it that in justice and reason, where men are not blinded by prejudice, must control it, because if the laws of nations apply they apply as well to property found anywhere in the loyal States that belonged to citizens of the rebel States, or any of them; whether that property and the person who owned it be found in the rebel States or the loyal States. That is the principle of the law of nations.

When England and the United States were at war every subject of England within the United States was an alien enemy, and the property of every such subject within the United States, if a law had been passed by Congress confiscating the property, would have been forfeited from the owner, and would have vested in the United States. But such a law of confiscation not having been passed after the declaration of war in 1812, the Supreme Court solemnly decided that for the want of that act of confiscation the title and possession of the property of the alien enemy resident within the United States remained with the alien enemy, and he could not be molested in the possession or ownership of that property. Sir, the honorable Senator's concession yields the point, that the principle of national law in relation to alien enemies does not and cannot apply in our country, and the cases which I put are well calculated to illustrate the absurdity and the unsoundness of the gentleman's position. But to concede that his position is fully right he must bring forward a law of Congress confiscating the property of Sue Murphey and of every person whose residence and circumstances were similar to hers; and in the absence of such a law I claim his vote, I claim the vote of every Senator who has opposed the passage of this bill in its favor, and I claim it upon the principles of public law, for which they themselves contend.

Mr. COLE, Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. WILSON. There is lying on the table

a little bill from the House of Representatives which it is important to put on its passage, and I hope we shall be allowed to pass it. It will take but a few moments.

Mr. COLE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate two House bills which are on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. John's, Michigan, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

The bill (H. R. No. 1598) to relieve from disability R. W. Best and Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that that bill be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear some explanation in regard to these two individuals.

Mr. WILSON. I understand one is reporter and the other the clerk of the court in North Carolina; and the court is now in session, and it is important to act on the bill. The House of Representatives have passed it, and the delegation from that State are unanimously for it.

Mr. HOWARD. That explanation does not quite satisfy me, I must confess. One is the clerk of the court and the other reporter of the court. The question with me is whether they are deserving of the clemency which is claimed for them here. They may be very good men in the stations which they hold, but may not be very deserving of the votes of the Senate. I should like to know whether they have exhibited any evidence of returning loyalty and friendship for the Government of this country; whether they have presented "fruits meet for repentance," or whether they are merely asking this favor at our hands in order that they may continue to hold the offices.

Mr. ABBOTT. I can answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan. I know both of these men perfectly well, and it is perfectly proper that their disabilities be removed. Mr. Best has been appointed clerk of the supreme court, and the court is now in session and waiting for his disabilities to be removed so that he can act. I received a dispatch this morning from the Governor requesting me to have it done to-day.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not entirely satisfied with the explanation that has been given.

Mr. ABBOTT. These men both voted for General Grant. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. That may be. I dare say there are many rebels who voted for Grant. I have not any doubt about that. They acted very properly in that regard. It was the very best thing they could do. I would inquire whether this bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for examination?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been referred in this body.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me, I must take the liberty of saying, that this hot haste in relieving disabilities at the request of almost anybody is turning the whole thing into ridicule and contempt. We have a clause in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution which, I think, meant something at the time it was proposed and at the time it was adopted, and I do not propose, for one, upon the request merely of anybody who sees fit to make a request to remove the disabilities created by that clause. I should like to see this bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and have them report on the subject, and if it be in order I will make that motion.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope this bill will not be referred. It is very important to these individuals that they should be relieved. The Senators from North Carolina concur in the fact that they have exhibited every evidence of loyalty that is requisite, not only in their private and social intercourse, but in their political action; and as a bill was passed the other day covering a case in Alabama, I see no reason why this bill should not pass by a unanimous vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When that clause was inserted in the amendment of the Constitution there was very considerable objection to it upon the ground that it would seriously affect many very excellent men, as they were represented to be; who were substantially forced into the rebellion and obliged to take office, and who were really, substantially, with us; and it was said to be hard to place a provision in the Constitution which would permanently, or which would probably for a long time disqualify them. I remember saying at the time, and I remember that it was so argued in committee, that it was necessary to have such a clause in order to keep out a greater or less number of men who really ought not to hold office; that at that time it was impossible to make distinctions; that if there were such men who really were entitled to the confidence of the community, and in reality disposed to discharge their duties as good citizens, and who were in the rebellion rather from the force of circumstances than from any desire on their own part, they would be readily relieved by the action of Congress; and on that ground I think it was that it was finally determined to retain the clause.

Now, sir, for myself I have been in favor of giving that power in Congress a very liberal interpretation, and if reasonable evidence was offered that men really were disposed to be good citizens and do their duty, and had committed no very flagrant offenses, I have thought it would be good policy to relieve them as fast as we could, and do away with the distinction thus made.

Now, sir, what evidence have we in these particular cases? We have the evidence that these men have been elected to office by our friends, by Union men, by the Union party of their State. That of itself is a pretty good indorsement. It shows the estimation in which they are held by those upon whose judgments we rely and upon whose loyalty we rely. We have, in addition to that, the testimony of the Senators that our friends have sent here as to the character and standing and worth of the individuals and the confidence placed in them by those in whom we have confidence, if we have confidence in anybody in that territory. Under these circumstances, as the Senator from North Carolina states that it is of very great importance that this subject should be acted upon, because public business waits upon the matter, I think myself that we have evidence enough for such a case, and that we shall run no hazard whatever in allowing them to be relieved from these disabilities thus imposed on such assurances as we have. I hope, therefore, the bill will not be referred, but that we shall act upon it as we have in other cases where we had similar evidence from members on this floor.

Mr. HOWARD, Mr. President, the object of my motion is sufficiently accomplished, perhaps. My desire was to hear something about the real character and status of these two gentlemen mentioned in the bill. The Senate have had no information on the subject at all, and the bill was about to be put on its passage without the slightest inquiry into the propriety of passing it or the merits of the persons mentioned in it. I understand, however, from the honorable Senators from North Carolina that these gentlemen have the confidence of the Republican party in that State, and that the judges of the court itself are especially anxious that the reporter should be relieved of his disabilities. Having received this information, which is to me satisfactory, I will, with the leave of the Senate, withdraw my motion to refer.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion may be entertained by unanimous consent, another question being pending.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection to the motion being heard and passed upon, and if the Senate desire to adjourn over I have no personal objection to that; but I desire to live long enough to see the debate closed on the pending bill. [Laughter.] If we should have a session to-morrow I should have some hope of surviving it. If it should go over until the next week my hope will be decidedly less. We have but a few days in which to close the session, and it seems to me it would only be a fair economy of time for us to sit to-morrow. If, however, the Senate would rather hear the rest of this debate next week than to hear it to-morrow I cannot object to that.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better have a session to-morrow. We have done little else thus far this session than adjourn. I think if there is any prospect of determining the Sue Murphey case before the 4th of March we had better sit it out. I am for meeting to-morrow certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Several SENATORS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. COLE] is entitled to the floor on the bill under consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. COLE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 8, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEWIS D. SMITH.

The SPEAKER stated that this being Friday the business in order in the morning hour was the reception of reports from committees on private cases; the pending question being on House joint resolution No. 389, for the relief of Lewis D. Smith, reported on the 18th of December from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY] now absent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have this morning received a letter from my colleague on the committee, [Mr. FERRY] asking me to take charge of this joint resolution. When the joint resolution was last up I believe the House was dividing.

The SPEAKER. It was, on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let the joint resolution and report be read.

The joint resolution authorizes and requires the Postmaster General, in settling the accounts of the claimant, postmaster at Iona, Michigan, to allow him a credit of the amount of moneys and stamps belonging to the United States intrusted to his care and stolen from his possession, not exceeding the sum of $1,861 28.

The report was read. It states that by affidavits submitted and verified by several of the most prominent and reliable citizens of Iona it appears that the claimant has held the office of postmaster at that place since April, 1865. During that time the post office has been kept in the rear of the ground story of a brick building, sixty feet of which was occupied by L. D. and M. C. Smith as a drug store; and communicating with the post office by a door. The moneys and valuables of the Government were uniformly deposited in one of Lilly's best burglar and fire proof safes, with a combination lock, in which also all the valuables of the firm were kept. On the night of October 15, 1867, not only was this safe, but other safes of business friends in the same place, broken open. This safe contained $600 in cash belonging to the Government, and $1,476 in postage stamps, together with $325 in cash belonging to L. D. and M. C. Smith. Every exertion was made to arrest the burglar and recover the money, but without success. The Postmaster General, in reply to the application for relief, replies that the regulations of the Department will not allow it, but deeming the case an exceptional one commends it to Congress for special consideration.

Mr. COBB. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to give way to a motion to refer this joint resolution to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot do that. The same request was before made of my colleague on the committee, and it was denied. The report which has been read shows that the case has been as well examined by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads as it could be by any other committee. It is with the House to say whether it shall go to another committee. If that should be the decision I do not know that I should object. If, however, such shall be the precedent established then all these questions will resolve themselves into a choice of reference. The Committee of Claims has now all the cases it can attend to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does this relate to stolen Government bonds?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Government bonds were stolen at the same time, but this relates to postage stamps. The safe was broken open, and at the same time these postage stamps were taken money belonging to merchants was also stolen. The postmaster has been charged with these stamps, and this joint resolution is for his relief. The Post Office Department has investigated the case and recommends the passage of this resolution. The question has been decided repeatedly that relief should be granted to claimants under like circumstances. Where a postmaster keeps postage stamps in a safe provided by the Government, or in the best safe he can get in case the Government provides none, and the property is stolen by a burglar without fault of the postmaster, the question is, shall the Government relieve him? That is all there is of it. The case has been thoroughly investigated.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish to know if there is any testimony before the Committee showing the fact that the doors were entered by violence to get into the store.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. MULLINS. Also whether the other safes were broken open in or about the post office the same night, and whether these parties themselves have been after the burglars. There seems to be nothing shown about that in the case.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not remember whether any other safes were broken open. I do not know that there were any others in the building.

Mr. MULLINS. Is there anything definite in regard to the manner in which the front door was broken open to get at the safe? I ask it for the purpose of bringing my mind to something definite as to the whole affair. We do not know but there may have been some of the parties directly interested in having the thing done. I would like to know how the building was entered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We have not examined the question in regard to other safes in the building, but the burglary was committed, the safe was broken open, and the property taken—not only the Government but private property also.

Mr. MULLINS. How was the front door broken open?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline to yield further.

Mr. MULLINS. And I decline to vote for the bill unless I see that somebody broke that door open who was not concerned in this matter.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 38, noes 20; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. MULLINS and FARNSWORTH.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. FERRY, on account of sickness.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported adversely on the following petitions; and the same were laid on the table:

Petition of Robert Brigham, praying for compensation for money expended as postmaster at Franklin, Pennsylvania; and Petition of E. S. Zeveryley, of Cumberland, Maryland.

EDWIN B. HOAG.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 281) for the relief of Edwin B. Hoag. It authorizes the Postmaster General to pay to the claimant, in addition to what he is now receiving, such sum or sums as shall make the payment for carrying the mail on route No. 11494 equal to the sum of $396 per annum for all the time he has conveyed or shall convey said mails on said route under the existing contract.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Read the report.

The report was read. It appears that the petitioner filed proposals for carrying the mail on routes Nos. 11493 and 11494 in Illinois. The first is between Cambridge and Geneseo, and the second between Cambridge and Galva. In filling up the blanks for the proposals he made an error, and filled up both papers as from Cambridge to Geneseo, thereby proposing to carry the mail for that route in one paper for $621, and in the other for $311, while neither paper named Galva. It further appears that a proposal was put in by one Morse for carrying the latter route for $396, being eighty-five dollars more than the bid of Mr. Hoag. In view of these facts, and it being evident that Mr. Hoag made an error in filling up his papers, and not deeming it right to take advantage of his evident error, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is the total amount?

Mr. LINCOLN. It is stated in the report. The difference was eighty-five dollars per annum, and the total is $396. There were two routes for which this gentleman intended to bid: one from Cambridge to Geneseo, and one, a shorter route, from Cambridge to Galva. By a mistake in filling up the blanks the name of Geneseo was inserted in both bids, and his bid intended for the shorter route was accepted for the longer route, and another contractor got the short route.

Mr. COBB. It would cost more to defeat this bill than the claim amounts to, but I do not think this very safe legislation. It is a violation of any safe rule of action.

Mr. BEAMAN. I observe that the report does not state whether in the judgment of the committee the amount which the contractor received for the service was too small. I would ask him if the committee considered that question?

Mr. LINCOLN. It was too small, and the committee so state.

Mr. BEAMAN. I understood the report to state that there was a mistake as to the route, but the report does not assert that the compensation was found to be too small by the committee.

Mr. LINCOLN. It is so stated, I think, in the report.

Mr. COBB. Does the bidder himself think that the compensation was too small? [Laughter.]

Mr. LINCOLN. The contractor?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINCOLN. Oh, of course he makes that assertion, and the committee so report. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY S. GIBBONS.

Mr. LINCOLN, (on behalf of Mr. FERRY,) from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with an amendment, joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. Johns, Michigan.

The joint resolution authorizes and requires the Postmaster General, in settling the accounts of Henry S. Gibbons, late postmaster at St. John's, Michigan, to allow him a sum not exceeding $600 as indemnification for a like amount belonging to the post office fund stolen from him by burglars, and which amount has been paid to the United States by the said Gibbons.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out "$600" and insert "$500."

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does this joint resolution contain an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The effect of it is to give the Postmaster General authority to settle the accounts of the claimant, but it contains no appropriation, for it would take money already appropriated. It should be a bill, and not a joint resolution.

The report was read.

Mr. LINCOLN. I demand the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was put on the passage of the joint resolution; and there were—ayes 30, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LINCOLN and SCOFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 59.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would like to ask a question before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent, as the previous question is now operating.

No objection was made.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would ask if the committee have any other proof that this money was stolen than the statement of the postmaster himself? I would like to have that question answered before I vote upon this question.

Mr. LINCOLN. The proof from the Post Office Department is, that this man was robbed in the manner described; proof to that effect has been submitted to the Department, so that they were satisfied that the robbery was committed.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Are the committee entirely satisfied?

Mr. LINCOLN. They are, unanimously. The proof was that the man was robbed by a burglar entering his room at night and stealing his money. He paid the amount to the Department, and the Postmaster General writes the committee that he has no authority to refund the amount, but it must be done by Congress.

Mr. SCOFIELD. All that we know is what this man says. He says he had so much money taken from him, of which so much belonged to the United States. I suppose the evidence is clear enough that money was stolen.

Mr. LINCOLN. Here is a statement indorsed by a hundred citizens of the place vouching for the honesty and integrity of this man.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution; and being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 55, not voting 90; as follows:

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Roder W. Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Fields, Fox, French, Garfield, Gove, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Richard D. Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Young—90.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAIL DELIVERY, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. BARNES. I have the consent of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the joint resolution be read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall object to this and everything else within the morning hour that is not private business.

Mr. BARNES. Then I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

No objection was made.

Accordingly the joint resolution (H. R. No. 392) respecting the delivery of mail matter within the city of Brooklyn, New York, was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SESSION OF TO-MORROW.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have a report to make from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, for a moment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to move that the session of to-morrow be for debate only.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I will move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope not.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say a few words on this proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot yield and allow the morning hour to be taken up in this way.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to debate the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] or for him to submit such a proposition at this time.

LUTHER M'NEAL.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 860, for the relief of Luther McNeal, late postmaster at Lancaster, Erie county, New York.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, proposes to pay to Luther McNeal for money and postage stamps belonging to the United States, and which were stolen from the post office at the town of Lancaster, Erie county, New York, while he was postmaster, $178 35, which sum he has paid to the Government on settlement with the Post Office Department, the money to be paid out of the Post Office fund by the Postmaster General upon McNeal making satisfactory proof that the money and stamps were stolen without fault on his part.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear the report in this case.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no written report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think there ought to be such a report.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads unanimously recommend the passage of this bill. I can state in a few moments the facts of the case. Mr. McNeal was postmaster at the place named in the bill, and while he held that position the safe in his office was robbed of $229 35. Fifty-one dollars of this money was afterward recovered from the burglars, who were convicted of the crime, and are now serving out their term in the penitentiary. The proofs in the case are lying on my desk. One hundred and forty-four dollars of the sum was in Government stamps; $85 35 was in legal-tender notes. After deducting the amount recovered there is a balance of $178 35. The whole amount has been paid to the Postmaster General. I find by an examination of the books that everything has been settled up, and the postmaster has been discharged from all accountability. He now asks that the Postmaster General may be authorized to pay him back this sum of $178 35; and the committee recommend this reimbursement, they being satisfied that the loss was not the result of any negligence of the postmaster. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot yield, because there is but a half minute of the morning hour remaining.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 41, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill goes over till the morning hour on next private bill day.

R. W. BEST AND S. F. PHILLIPS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Committee on Reconstruction, who are authorized to report at any time, have directed me to report a bill (H. R. No. 1598) to relieve from disabilities R. W. Best and Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina. I ask that it be put on its passage now.

The bill was read a first and second time. It proposes to enact, with the concurrence of two-thirds of each House, that all political disabilities imposed by the United States upon R. W. Best and Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina, in consequence of participation in the recent rebellion be removed.

Mr. CULLOM. I would like to offer an amendment, to add to the bill the name of William F. Taylor, of Virginia. The removal of his disabilities has been recommended by the Secretary of War and a great many other gentlemen of high character.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not authorized by the committee to accept any amendment. If my colleague [Mr. CULLOM] will have the case he mentions referred to the committee they will examine and report upon it; but I am not authorized by the committee to permit any amendment to this bill.

I will state the reason for reporting the bill and asking its passage this morning. One of the gentlemen whom it proposes to relieve is the clerk of the supreme court of North Carolina, and the other is the reporter of that court. The court is, I understand, now in session, but cannot do business because of the disabilities of these officers. The delegation from North Carolina desired the committee to report this bill at once, and ask its passage.

Mr. CULLOM. I will state for the information of the gentleman that this man whose disabilities I desire to have removed is in an exactly similar situation. The Secretary of War, the general commanding the district where this gentleman resides, and a great many other men of the highest character, recommend the removal of his disabilities as speedily as possible. Otherwise I would not ask for the insertion of his name without a reference of the case to the committee.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no authority from the committee to consent to such an amendment.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will first yield to my colleague on the Committee on Reconstruction, [Mr. PAINE,] who desires to make an observation.

Mr. PAINE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the amendment he offers. We have had such recommendations as the one the gentleman refers to; but, sir, we have decided that we must have something more than recommendations—that we must have facts before us for our own examination before reporting bills to the House for its action.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw my proposition for amendment, and will present the case to the committee in the hope that it will receive early action.

Mr. MULLINS. Am I to understand that this man has to be appointed or the supreme court will be suspended?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He has been already appointed.

Mr. MULLINS. Then we must relieve him or this supreme court will be suspended. Now, I wish to know whether this is the first time that the gentleman has heard of the supreme court of that State having been suspended by rebels. If the court is not to be suspended unless we pass this then I shall contest it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MULLINS demanded tellers; and afterward the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 104, noes 16.

So (two thirds having voted in the affirmative) the bill was passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise to propose an adjournment over till Monday next; but before doing so I will ask unanimous consent that the session of to-morrow shall be for debate alone.

Mr. CULLOM. A good many gentlemen desire to make speeches, and I think the House will do itself no injustice by allowing that to be done; but, sir, for my part I should prefer that we shall have to-morrow a morning hour for reports from committees of private bills and after that a session for debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to a session to-morrow for debate only, but I am in favor of a session for business.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move, then, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 73, noes 39.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection to a session to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not make the objection in a captious spirit, but from the conviction that we ought to devote a portion of this session, at least, to private business, and to-morrow is one of the days set apart for that purpose. Private bills have been more neglected during this Congress than any preceding one that I know of.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. It is apparent that the House will vote to adjourn over; and what, then, can the gentleman gain by objecting to a session to-morrow for debate only?

Mr. MAYNARD. That is the question to be settled.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to the point of order that debate on this motion is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to have replied to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUNTER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 73, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. WASHINGTON TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the secretary of Washington Territory, inclosing estimates of the current expenses of the Legislative Assembly in the secretary's office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CREEK INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with estimates of appropriations required to carry out the treaty with the Creek nation of Indians; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SALVAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the claims of the officers and crews of the United States gunboat, De Soto and transport Crescent for salvage against the United States steamer Leviathan. As this presents a question, the Chair will have read the last sentence of the letter of the Secretary of War, and the House can then determine to what committee it shall be referred.

The Clerk read the following extract from the letter of the Secretary of War:

"I avail myself of this occasion further to suggest that it be made a matter of inquiry as to whether the public advantage would not be promoted by a repeal of the statute allowing salvage to salvors of public vessels where the parties belong to the public armed service. It would seem to be of questionable justice that the United States should be called upon to pay for assistance rendered its own vessels in distress by its own officers and crews."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLEY. To the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CHANLER. It suggests a change in the law in regard to salvage; and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLEY. I assent to that.

The communication was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACT FOR POSTAGE STAMPS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 14th ultimo, advertisements of proposals, contracts, and correspondence relative to postage stamps; which, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, withdrew from the files of the House the papers in the following cases, for the purpose of presenting the same before a committee of the Senate: William R. Riley, James Selden, J. R. D. Morrison; John W. Baden, administrator; G. L. Machenheimer, Frederick G. Rohe, Charles J. Stewart, John H. McChesney; Sarah A. Butt, administratrix; Richard Butt, Robert McChesney, William B. Beall, James B. Anderson, Abram Hyman, J. Thomas Talbert, Enos Ray, Henrietta Norton; Thomas Fitnan, sen., by Augustus Fitnan; Jacob Coleclager, James Pilling, A. C. P. Shoemaker, Sarah Matthews, James Mulloy, B. D. Carpenter, Oliver Dufour, Henry Martin, Daniel V. Colclazer, Jacob Poss, and D. V. Celclazer for D. L. Howe.

SEBASTIAN REICHERT.

Mr. BAKER, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire what relief, if any, is due to Sebastian Reichert, of St. Clair county, Illinois, in consequence of the failure of certain patents of the United States to convey title, and that said committee report in the premises by bill or otherwise.

INTERNAL TAX ON NAVAL MACHINERY.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1827) to amend an act to exempt certain manufacturers from internal tax, and for other purposes, approved March 31, 1868, with an amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It amends the act of 1868, in the second section, so as to allow manufacturers of naval machinery for the Government all the benefits conferred by said act upon other manufacturers, repealing all taxes upon such machinery not heretofore assessed and collected.

The amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means was to strike out all after the word "machinery" to the end of the section, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "which had not accrued prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, are hereby remitted."

Mr. SCHENCK. I will explain briefly the object of the bill. When the bill which was passed and which became a law on the 31st of March last was pending it was, so far as the action of the House was concerned, passed without the second section of the bill. It contained simply a provision that there should be no further taxation after the 1st of April, 1868, upon the products of manufacturing industry. Subsequently an amendment of the Senate, agreed to in committee of conference, provided that it should not apply to the productions of manufacturing processes by those who had contracts with the Navy Department for furnishing machinery to the Government. The object of this seemed to be to make an exception in their cases, because it was understood that there had been from time to time under those contracts deliveries of portions of the machinery, while the tax upon the portion of the contract completed or the machinery delivered in part was withheld by the Government, and therefore the bill passed retroactively in some sense in its effects.

Now, in the House the position was taken that all contractors, whether with the Government or as between individuals, should be put upon an equality, and should have no tax put upon that which they produced after the 1st of April. The bill, which was once reported from the Committee of Ways and Means and then recommitted, would relieve these gentlemen not merely from the tax accrued after the 1st of April, as in the case of other producers of machinery, but would also give them the benefit of relief against the payment of the tax which had accrued prior to the 1st of April. We propose, therefore, to amend the bill in such a way that all taxes which accrued prior to the 1st of June, 1868, shall be paid; thus putting them on the same footing as all other contractors and citizens, and only remitting the taxation after the 1st of April, 1868.

I do not know that I can make the matter clearer by further explanation. The object is to amend the bill so as to give them this benefit only in accordance with the provisions of the law which extends the same benefit to all other persons.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman who will be the recipients of the benefit of the amended bill, and if the benefit is limited, as I understand it to be, to contractors for the Government for naval machinery?

Mr. SCHENCK. The Government will collect from contractors all taxes which have accrued, although they have not been collected, prior to the 1st of April last. The contractors for any portion of machinery furnished after the 1st of April will get the same benefit as all other persons producing manufactured articles obtain under the law. The object is to amend the bill so that it shall not give these manufacturers of machinery for the Government the benefit of being released from taxation which accrued prior to the 1st of April. The original bill provided that they should be relieved from that not collected, but there was that which had not been collected but which had accrued, and the committee have come to the conclusion they ought to pay that which had accrued, although not collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1598) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the special order for Monday next, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is very proper. The gentleman may be enabled to strike out some things which would decrease the public expenses.

Mr. BROOKS. I only half heard what the gentleman said.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said that by taking advantage of points of order and striking out some matters in the naval bill the gentleman could increase the public expenses.

Mr. BROOKS. It is very easy for a man who bellows here loudly for economy and by the consumption of time disgusts the House and creates a disposition to expend forty times the amount of public money that would otherwise be spent to make insinuations of that sort.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a bill (H. R. No. 263) to extend the jurisdiction of probate courts and of justices of the peace in the Territories of Idaho and Montana.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 167) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg, in said State;

An act (S. No. 712) to define the fees of recorder of deeds, and to provide for the appointment of warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 722) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," by extending certain penalties to accessories; and

An act (S. No. 730) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to confirm the titles to certain lands in the States of Nebraska."

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all general debate upon the Military Academy appropriation bill shall terminate in an hour and a half.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HULBURD in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 1596, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on this bill must terminate in one hour and a half.

The bill was read at length.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to detain this committee for a short time to discuss a proposition which has been before the House during very nearly the whole of the last session. It is perhaps not entirely legitimate to discuss such a proposition during the pendency of the bill now before us. I refer to the bill reported from a committee, and known as the civil service bill, or otherwise known as "Mr. JENCKES'S bill." I do not know how that bill may have struck the minds of other members of the House, but it has led me to believe that it is a bill of very great importance, one that should be examined very carefully by members prior to their action upon the same.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the bill known as Mr. JENCKES'S "civil service bill," which provides for a new department of Government and a "life tenure for all civil offices of the United States, except those wherein the Senate must consent to the appointment;" and in opposing this bill I desire to say I am in favor of having the business of this Government, in every department, transacted with the utmost intelligence, fidelity, and dispatch. I believe that all employés in the service of the Government should have intelligence and capacity sufficient to enable them to perform their duties in a satisfactory manner, and that they receive such compensation as will make them proof against dishonesty and ambitious of promotion. I am in favor of governmental economy, but I do not regard that to be a wise economy which pinches a subordinate to lavish on a superior. In a word, sir, I desire to see the affairs of the nation transacted by all its participants with the utmost attainable precision, aptitude, and integrity; and whenever it is shown to me that a reform is needed in any point and it can be effected by any proper legislation I will cheerfully vote for it.

I think it is proper that I should thus express my views in order that I may not be misunderstood in my motives or feelings when I say that I cannot vote for this bill nor advocate the system which is embodied in it. I think that the bill is bad in theory, wrong in principle, opposed to the genius and spirit of our institutions and our people, and probably unconstitutional in its legal aspect. I regard the introduction of a bill like this, and the favor with which it has been thus far received by both parties and the press of the country, as one of the most positive, and, therefore, one of the most alarming signs of the inauguration of a policy which if persisted in will end in the obliteration of all that is republican in this Government and the substitution of that which is monarchical in its stead. If I had had nothing but the bill itself before me I might have hesitated before expressing this opinion; but when I read, as I have done with great care, the report of the committee and the exhibits attached to their report, and find their whole plan is taken openly, boldly, and without disguise from monarchical Governments, I cannot doubt what its results will be if I could doubt the intention.

This bill gives a life tenure of office to every employé of the Government in the civil service. In that particular alone it is opposed to the theory of our institutions. I will not consume the time of the House by reading the opinions of the fathers of the Constitution upon this feature. We are all familiar with them. We all remember the controversy which arose upon the attempt to introduce that feature into our system of government. The dangers which were predicted then from such a source are just as imminent and just as perilous now. The inevitable result to liberty is just as inevitable now. The establishment of a favored class, ending in the establishment of a haughty and recognized aristocracy, is just as certainly dangerous now as then. The tendencies of an order established by Government and perpetuated by law to centralization and tyranny is just as flexible to-day as it was when it was denounced by the debaters on the Constitution. When at last it was agreed that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States should hold office for life there were not wanting those at that time who regarded the concession as the only blemish on the fair face of the Constitution.

I shall be answered doubtless that this bill does not relate to any elective or responsible officer of the Government, but only to those who may be denominated its clerical force, and therefore as they are not a part of the Government in either of its three divisions, executive, legislative, or judicial, they are powerless for harm and impotent for mischief; that none of the reasons apply to them which were urged on the occasion to which I have referred. I have considered that, and I have read and considered all that the committee have said in favor of their efficiency and their organization, but still reply that the objection can be as well made against them as against any others, and that the danger to be avoided is as much to be within their power to propagate as any other.

Sir, I wish to announce it here in irrevocable terms that I am opposed to all class legislation in any form and against all perpetuities of office in a land of liberty. It is the theory of this Government that all its members shall be constantly before the people, resigning the trusts which have been temporarily bestowed upon them. One and all must lay down their offices to the constituents who gave them. If they are approved in their official course, and are returned to their places, it is well. But their term of office is short, in order that the people may have almost immediate redress from an unsatisfactory or unfaithful servant.

It is the people, sir, who are to govern this country, and they are to govern according to the will of the majority of them, whatever that will may be. When it is once lawfully expressed it is paramount and supreme. It may be said that the people are whimsical, and fly to-day from what they approached yesterday. It may be they are unreasonable at times, and remove an elected officer without cause and with great injustice. It may be that they are capricious and adopt the views with acclamations which they had just rejected with derision. But whatever they may be, in the minds of some they are the governing power, and their fiat is conclusive. It is by having their agents constantly before them that their acts may be denounced or confirmed that the people maintain their supremacy and enforce their will. This, sir, is the theory and the practice of our Government. Immediate responsibility we all incur, and speedy settlements we all must render. The appointment of subordinates or the nominations for appointments are just as much a part of our responsibility as any other which we have, and a share in those appointments and the right to become for a time a portion of the administrative force of the Government is one of the recognized rights of the people of which it is proposed by this bill, utterly and forever, to deprive them.

I do not intend to discuss the justice of the maxim which has been acted upon in our politics for so many years past, that "to the victors belong the spoils." That is a mere party and pecuniary consideration with which I do not intend to deal in my remarks to-day. The question involved in this bill rises far above that, and entirely overshadows all such minor and petty influences, and I desire to give especial notice that I do not oppose this bill because it deprives this party or that party from sharing in the emoluments of party successes, but I oppose it because it assaults the theory of our Constitution and destroys the wholesome practices of our people.

Every Administration is justly held responsible by the country for the policy it pursues, the measures which it upholds, and the good or evil which springs therefrom. It happens not unfrequently that the success or failure of an administrative design is caused by the acts of those who are intrusted with its execution. A whole scheme has often been thwarted by some insignificant subordinate and the fate of a party has turned upon an accident.

An incoming Administration has, therefore, clearly a right to demand that any person who may be known to harbor hostility to its wholesome measures or enmity to our institutions shall not be retained in the public service. The right to demand this rests not alone upon the necessity of unanimity in all departments of public service; not alone upon the right of the officers-elect to choose those agents whom they may deem to be the best to carry out their views; not alone upon the principle that a spy shall not be tolerated in military or civil pursuits, but upon the broader ground that the Administration represents the country for the time being and is the embodiment of the country's welfare and prosperity, unless it has proved treacherous to the principles upon which the people placed it there; and that he who does not unite in its views is not to be intrusted with its employment. I recognize this principle, sir, as a wise and salutary one; I do not say I would apply it in all instances, but I insist that the right to apply it shall not be taken away.

Every gentleman will admit the correctness of these views when applied to those who fill the higher and more responsible positions in our public affairs—the immediate assistants in the various Departments. It will be immediately conceded that these persons should have the same political tone and feeling as their principals.

But I shall be told that this does not hold good in the case of the thousand and one employes whose duties are of the most fixed and unalterable character. It will be seen, sir, that the bill applies not only to these, but to those; not only to the messenger, but to the minister; not only to one, but to all. It includes all officers whatever in any and all departments of the civil service, of every grade, of every kind, of every shade of responsibility, of every degree of importance, without any exception whatever, but postmasters and persons to be confirmed by the Senate.

Gentlemen are mistaken who suppose that no injury can result from the retention in office of persons who are inimical to the Administration—and when I use this word I mean to include in it all the branches of the Government—because such persons hold obscure positions or are without political influence. There can be no greater error indulged in. What was the fact in the first years of rebellion? It was notorious, sir, that the majority of the incumbents of the small offices here were all secessionists; the confederate flag was worshipped in every nook and corner of the public buildings; hundreds of fifth-rate clerks sneered at Abraham Lincoln; and while there was an atmosphere of patriotism in the White House and in the heads of Departments there was a gushing current of treason and a sentiment of hate which penetrated into all the recesses of the public service and was felt in every ramification of the city. Disloyalty flaunted itself everywhere so loudly and prominently that if a foreigner had come into this place he might have supposed he was in the stronghold of the South instead of the Capitol of the nation. What was the effect of it? Why, sir, there was no secret safe from discovery and disclosure. There was no campaign planned that was not known and revealed before it was consummated. There was no movement to be made that was not anticipated before it was begun. They were instantly possessed of our Cabinet councils; and prepared to avert our every blow. How did they get this information? Those who were at the head of affairs were true, and resorted to new means of secrecy every time they were betrayed. But turn which way they would they were still betrayed.

We know now, sir, that these small place-holders were the pipes of communication; these insignificant people who have no political influence; who cannot affect any measure or interfere with any legislation; who are swarming now as thick as summer flies, swearing they were the first men who advocated the election of Grant, and who as the country increases, and the public service increases with it will increase as fast; those were the class who in 1861–62 came near delivering this city into the hands of the enemy, and almost succeeded at the time in dealing the death-stroke to this country. We should learn something by experience, and the lessons which that rebellion have taught us are not confined to its military character. They extend, or should extend, to every branch of our legislation.

Suppose this bill had been a law in 1861, and that all those persons to whom I have referred had been holding office under it by the life tenure. What should we have done? How should we have been rid of them? Should we have tried them under the act? Can you imagine the heads of Departments holding courts to hear charges and to try cases of clerks and employes at that time. If there had been as many hours in a day as there are minutes, and if each head of Department had had the eyes of Argus, and the arms of Briareus, they would not have been sufficient for the business. And what could have been proved against them? In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred you could have proved nothing at all against them. If you had proceeded upon strictly legal evidence you could not have convicted one in a thousand. How would you have indicted the supercilious sneerer or described the ineffable contempt? How would you have reported the telegraphic glance of the eye or presented the curl of the nose and the lip which were the only outward signs of the traitor, albeit you knew his heart was reeking with treason. His midnight communication with the enemy you did not know, nor of his dispatches in cipher, or signals in colors. The mode of his correspondence you did not know, and in many cases you did not even suspect; and even if you had suspected ever so strongly where was your proof to warrant a conviction? Even if your proof had been at hand and as strong as holy writ was there time and opportunity and safety to try them on the proofs?

Had our President and our Departments no other occupation, then, but to try clerks and entertain appeals and examine allegations of error and consider judgments? Where was the enemy? Would he not "have been thundering at our gates" with something heavier than a supersedeas? Where would the country have been, sir? I do not know that it is too much to say that if there had been no summary power to dismiss and disperse all the treasonable elements which were in the public service when the rebellion commenced the struggle for freedom might have been continued for years, and the result might have been different to-day.

I hope that we have seen the last of war. I trust that this country may never again be visited with its horrors. I do not like to consider war as a possible contingent upon any event. Yet it would be criminal weakness in us all if we did not so shape our laws for the future that they may include the condition of war as well as peace. Therefore I ask in what condition would war find us hereafter if, perchance, the feeling of the governmental employes were to be arrayed against the Government as they were in the outset of the rebellion? Think of our situation with a war upon our hands and the entire working force of the Government clothed with office for life, and disaffected. The knot would have to be cut by the sword. Military law would be applied. Martial law, courts-martial and commissions, arbitrary dismissals, and all the necessary train of evils which always fall upon a land unprepared for war, would be felt.

It is stated in the report of Mr. JENCKES, chairman, that this system has worked well in other Governments, in attaching the employes to the Government, and in preventing them from becoming dangerous to the country. I presume as much will be claimed for this bill. I can readily understand how it would occur in a monarchy like France or England or Prussia. Bread riots and barricades are not got up by well fed officials and sleek flunkies.

The desperate wretch who rushes to revolution for food becomes a very different man when appointed for life to a good place. We have no such classifications of society here now as they have there, although if this bill becomes a law we soon will have. We have no king nor nobles nor titles. We have no such extremes of wealth and poverty. He who is of the Government there has not only a position for life, but his posterity succeed to it. His position brings not only sustenance, but social distinction. He becomes one of the governing class, no matter how humble. His interests are with the monarchy, and removed from the people. He is no longer of the people, even though he came of them originally. He has risen above them in his own sphere, whatever that may be. He is not responsible to the people, for the people have no voice in his affairs. If he loses his place by revolution or otherwise he is thrown back again into the great seething mass of humanity whose only knowledge of life is its toil; whose ever enduring and recurring struggle in life is for bread, and whose only consolation at the close of life is the rest afforded by the grave.

How was it with those who were here at the outset of the rebellion? For the most part they were clerks who had held their places for many years. They were resident here; many had property here. They belonged to the old Democratic party and to the southern wing of that party. They were of the assured aristocratic class who believed that they were better than all others and that office was created for them to fill. They had them for long periods. Practically speaking, they held by a life tenure. Many instances are remembered where they had held from boyhood to old age. Did all this make them loyal or prevent them from being actually disloyal? Not at all. The very principle which underlies this bill operated with them and influenced them. Their long tenure of office engendered and swelled their pride; they looked with disdain upon the new men who came here to oust them from their places. They believed it was their exclusive right to hold office and the people had no right to elect any other to hold it. They were not in need of bread, and did not need to cling to the Government for sustenance; but in one respect they had the feeling of their aristocratic compatriots across the water. They did not like the vulgar people, as they termed them, who had voted them out of place; they were not of those people, and had no sympathies in common with them. They had a caste of their own, and they adhered to it scrupulously.

Why did these people go off from their Government, sir, if long tenure of office serves to draw incumbents to it? They had everything: office, money, property, social position, aristocratic habits and ideas, recognition, birth, and intelligence. They went off, sir, because they said a principle of government was involved—a principle. That is something, sir, that the incumbent in Europe is never allowed to have and never will have, a principle at stake in the form of government. He does not have a ballot. He does not help to make or unmake the Government every four years, and therefore he cannot have a question of principle between himself and his king; and you may rest assured that whenever an American believes a principle is concerned the mere matter of office will not be sufficient to induce him to forego it. He is human nevertheless, and as liable to err in office, and unmindful of the duties of his office, as any of the office-holding family in the world. What then? If he holds for life, then that occurs which is not contemplated in our theory of administration, namely, a person is holding a position under this Government who is not responsible to the people; who cannot be touched by any other officer of this Government, however exalted; who is not affected by any change of administration, however he may view it. A person who although he may have been originally of the people and from the people, yet soon will become by the immunity which he enjoys, by the security of his place, by the hardening of long continued position, removed from the people, with but few feelings in common with them, and at last to have an utter disregard and contempt for them. For these reasons I say that this bill does not accord with the spirit of our Government nor the practice under it. I say it is opposed to the genius of our institutions and the policy of our nation.

But, sir, we are told by the resolution of inquiry and the report of the committee that "the public service has been used as an instrument of political and party patronage," and that this bill is necessary to prevent that evil in the future. I propose to examine it, sir, in that light, to see if it sustains this promise of its author, or whether, upon the contrary, it is not in itself one of the most bold and potent schemes for prostituting the public service by patronage that ever was presented by an American Congress.

I know that many "errors have crept into the service of the State." I am aware that many departments of the Government have suffered and are now suffering from incompetent and dishonest officials of every station and degree, and I would gladly vote for some proper measure by which all this can be remedied. But when I read this bill and see to what it will bring the country, and what will be its effects upon the liberties of the people and their rights of election and representation, I say it is better to "Bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of."

I disclaim all intention of reflecting upon the motives of any one concerned in the preparation of this act, but I cannot refrain from denouncing it as a scheme whereby this country would soon be brought to the condition of those monarchies from which the forms of the bill have been borrowed.

I propose to examine the details of the bill and to show what would be the operations of it when once it is enforced. It provides that a new executive department shall be created; that the Vice President shall be the head of it; that a board of commissioners shall be appointed, who shall have power to make rules and ordain examinations under them, to divide the country into districts, and to delegate all their powers to other parties. It further provides that all persons who may hereafter desire to be employed in the civil service of the Government in any capacity whatever shall be obliged to submit themselves for examination as to their qualifications, after paying a fee, to this board of examiners or some deputy thereof.

The appointments shall be made from the list of those who prove themselves to be the best qualified, and when once appointed they are to hold their appointments for life, upon good behavior. Every branch of the service is to be divided into grades, and every incumbent is to be promoted from the lower grades whenever a vacancy occurs. A list is to be kept of all applicants, and as vacancies occur from any cause they are to be filled by the applicants who are awaiting their turn.

The "board" is to provide for a species of court-martial or commission to try, adjudge, and punish all offenders. The decision of the board is final as to applications. There is no power of appeal or review. The President, Senate, or head of any Department may not only require all applicants in the future to submit themselves to this board, but may order all present incumbents to appear before it and abide by their decision, females as well as males. This is assimilating the civil service to the military service of the Government. This is engrafting all the discipline, the rigidity, the severity of the Army upon the civil branch. It is concentrating all the power into the hands of one man, namely, the Vice President of the United States. Whether he would use the power judiciously and disinterestedly is not now to be known; but certain it is, that if you desire to keep public patronage out of party politics the power of appointment must not all be centered in one man.

Is it not palpable that if he so desired to use his power of appointment the Vice President could make himself the President spite of all opposition and beyond all the efforts of the people? The organization of office-holders which he could make would be so firm and invincible that the will of the people could never be expressed or executed. And the immense number of persons now employed and to be employed, who cause, the report says, the patronage to be a political evil, would only make him the more compact. If it is an evil in its present shape how much more would it be an evil in such a shape? Who would be the fountain-head of all power of promotion? The Vice President. Who would be the arbiter to whom they would look in the last resort? The Vice President. Who would be their benefactor? The Vice President. To whom would their gratitude be due? The Vice President. Whose interests would they desire to serve and to whom show their gratitude? The Vice President. Who would command that vast army of civilians whose numbers would be greater than the peace list of the regular Army? The Vice President. He might be a man who was so void of ambition as not to use his power; he might be so regardless of exalted station as not to attempt to gain it; he might be so virtuous that all his influence would be for his country's good; he might be so conscientious as never to know favor or affection; he might be a paragon in public life or he might not be; and I never will consent to place the whole liberties of the people in the hollow of his hand, be he who he may.

In every Department, from its head down to the usher at the door, he would have control. At every desk, in every book, on every page, from the scribe to the sweeper of the floor, his name would appear on their certificate of examination. Every man, woman, and child who make up that long and sometimes sad procession which issues out in defile day after day from all the places of labor when the closing hour has come will recognize him as their benefactor. Every aspirant who seeks preferment, and every expectant who hopes for increased salary, will seek to conciliate him. Every candidate who has been accepted on the roll, and who is waiting for a vacancy, or whose friends desire to have a vacancy made, will supplicate him. His influence will be confined to no one State or bounded by any Territory short of our whole country. Every man in every custom-house, in every collection district, every county and precinct; the whole catalogue of revenue officers, subordinates in every post office, clerks of every kind and name, employes of every variety of occupation, from the surveyor's chainman, who on the westernmost prairie braves the Indian bullet while he performs his task, to the civet-scented dandy who lolls on velvet cushions and treads on tapestry carpets in the inner bureaus of Washington—all these, and others not enumerated, "whose name is legion,"—all, all will know him to be the man to whom to look, whom to honor.

Am I to be told that when once appointed, they are independent for life, and that their life tenure is given in order that they may be made regardless of just such influences. I have been in politics too long, and have been too long aware of the resources of party tactics to be silenced by any such belief. There must be some power lodged somewhere in somebody to remove them for good cause and upon trial, or else the bill would not have been listened to with common courtesy, so great would have been the indignation of this House at such a proposition. Well, then, so long as complaint can be made and a trial had and a dismissal procured, just so long there will not be wanting the old story of contrivances, of influences, of solicitations, and of machinery whereby one may be put out and another may be put in. Remember the Vice President is the President of the board. The board has the right to define what is misconduct in office by its rules and regulations. Was there never an instance where a rule was made to meet a particular case or strained to accomplish a particular purpose?

This board has the right to "establish a rule by which any person exhibiting particular merit may be advanced one or more points in their grades." Did it never happen that the particular merit was particular influence, and that the advancement was from the lowest to the highest at one jump? "One fourth of the promotions may be made on account of merit irrespective of seniority in service." Was it never the case that a stripling was promoted "on account of merit" over a veteran whose merits probably were not of a peculiar kind? "Or by advancement for meritorious service and special fitness." If we should search history would we not be able to find mention of those whose special fitness and meritorious service were more apparent to those who wanted to use them than to the world at large?

Nay, sir, if my memory serves me aright, I have heard—though I confess I do not believe the tale—that in the late war there were officers in the Army, both regular and volunteer, who were advanced one or more points in spite of the rules and regulations of promotion; that there were military boards and examining boards with power of dismissing incompetents, who made special examinations, and discovered merit which deserved promotion irrespective of seniority in service, and found special fitness for a particular branch of the service where it had been before presumed there was only particular unfitness for any branch of the service; in fact, I believe I have heard that spite of all boards and all rules, notwithstanding there was no seniority, notwithstanding there was a total lack of merit, and a total want of fitness there were generals made who never smelt more powder than that in a Fourth of July fire-cracker, and officers in every grade, who not only never had a command or filled a line of duty, but did not know the import of the words. But of course those persons only mean to be facetious who say there were clerks in the War Department brevetted to high rank for gallant charges upon a column of—figures—and repelling the advances of those ignorant and impertinent soldiers who, having been maimed and scarred in many battles, presumed to besiege the office to ask a slight promotion or favor.

Seriously, sir, the more the details of this bill are examined the more evident it will be that the act unintentionally, and from its very nature, clothes the Vice President of the United States with a power which might be used in unworthy hands to the fatal injury of the Government. Its objectionable character is not redeemed by a single desirable trait. Admitting that the Vice President was strictly faithful and conscientious in his administration of the bureau; even admitting the board were beyond all personal partisanship or bias, and uninfluenced by any but proper motives; even admitting that the operations of the act would insure a more faithful, intelligent, and efficacious class of employes, and the business of the Government would be transacted in a more scrupulous, orderly, and economical manner, and that there would be no want of harmony, no jealousy, no false reports or unmerited promotions in the service; say that it work as well as its most sanguine advocate can claim for it; admit that party patronage is no longer left with elected officials and can no longer be used "as a means of influencing politics," and still, sir, there is an objection yet remains, which is greater than any I have named. That objection is that the system begets a caste in this country. There is the favored class. There is the aristocratic tendency which inevitably comes of class, and which inevitably ends in centralization.

I have adverted to this incidentally before, when it fell in with another topic. But I wish now to call the most earnest attention of the House to that which stares us in the face. This bill is the opening wedge to an aristocracy in this country. It is first to be created by law, and then to maintain itself by its own power, which will increase from day to day until finally it will become irresistible. I say this deliberately, and after giving the bill the most careful attention. It will lead us to the point where there will be two national schools in this country—one for the military and the other for civil education. Those schools will monopolize all avenues of approach to the Government. Unless a man can pass one or the other of those schools and be enrolled upon their lists he cannot receive employment under this Government, no matter how great may be his capacity, how indisputable may be his qualifications. When once he does pass his school and fixes himself for life his next care will be to get his children there also. In these schools the scholars will soon come to believe that they are the only persons qualified to administer the Government, and soon come to resolve that the Government shall be administered by them and by none others.

Combinations will come. They may be at first nothing more than unity of feeling and purpose, which comes of simple association. It will be possibly only the feeling which the man of the world has for his Alma Mater. It may not take shape or purpose until some favorite candidate brings it together. Then it will learn its strength; afterward it will use its strength, and soon its strength will be so great as to overcome all organized opposition.

The two schools will combine, for they will have sentiments, hopes, and ambitions alike. Their tone, habits, and manner, will soon be distinctive. It will stamp itself upon society. It will arrogate to itself to be the "cream of the cream" of society. It will assume foreign airs, and shoddy will ape it and them. It will toady to titles and long for them, and if not swept away too soon will have them.

Let any man stand in the great cities of the East and see how, with our boasted wealth and refinement, we have imported European vices and monarchical customs. Look at the liveried servants, the emblazoned equipages, the coats of arms, and crests of heraldry—pages, tigers, outriders. That which is foreign is fashionable, and that which is fashionable is baleful and demoralizing. Who will not say that this moment titles and all the paraphernalia of royalty would not be hailed by these? Alas! for the days of republican simplicity. If the essential differences which prevail between our form of government and those of Europe were remembered it would be seen that the same reasons which make this system a good one there make it a bad one here. In this country every man has a political opinion and a vote. The vote of the poorest and humblest man counts as much as that of the richest and most distinguished.

Every man is interested in politics and uses his political influence whether or not he be employed in the service of the Government. There is no man in office, no matter how high, who is beyond the reach of the vote cast by one, no matter how low. There is no measure of State policy which may not be changed by a single vote. Every man here is a part of the Government. If he disagrees with the administration of the Government his vote will assist to change it. There is no class, save the United States judges, not amenable to his censure or not removable by his vote.

By the fluctuations of opinion parties and their adherents are constantly given and constantly stripped of office, and he who to-day might have felt himself above his fellow, by reason of his place, and have assumed superiority upon that account, to-morrow is thrown again into the pursuits of private life, and thus realizes that he is no better than another.

How is it in other countries? The king or queen is not to be reached by any voter, nor can the existing Government be ever changed, no matter how oppressive, unless by violence and arms. There but few have a voice in the administration, and these few are of the privileged class. They are of the higher orders. But even they can only effect a change of certain measures. The great business of the Government goes in spite of them and spite of any particular changes which they may have accomplished. These higher classes are educated for the special purpose of being politicians. The lower people have no such education. They are kept in careful ignorance of these first principles of legislation known to every boy here. No man of the lower classes can hope there to become a part of the Government by the simple rotation in office. The ins are always in; the outs are forever out. Consequently the classes are wide apart. When the sons in a higher family determine their pursuits it is always with reference to the Government service in some branch or another. One goes into the army, another the navy; one to the church, another is attached to a foreign embassy, another to the home department. In England and France professional pursuits are now added to the list; but these, if not considered a step downward, are a step off. It is getting out of the State.

How is it with the other classes? The sons of a successful merchant prince may go into the learned professions; that is a step upward. But they can no more say "we will go into the State" than they can clasp the moon. Nor can they step over the social line to those who are already of the State. How is it with the lower classes? If they can attain to that point where the wolf is no longer at the door, where conscription no longer threatens, they have come to their highest goal. They have no thought of the State nor vote in it. They are taxed and governed. If they can pay the tax the Government is good. When, therefore, a system is adopted which opens the door to the peasant as well as to the rich commander and younger sons of nobility, and which adopts them all into the service of the State according to their respective merits and makes them part of the State, and guarantees them office for life or good behavior and sure promotion for faithful service; which allows them to step over the line and to be of the select; which removes them from all thought of revolution and makes them a privileged class, it is not strange that such a system should make such men loyal to their king. Every promotion draws them nearer to the State, and the nearer they are to the State the further they are from the people.

This is a new danger to the country, and it comes not with the bold front of revolution, but with the pleasing show of reform. It appeals to our protection with a special plea, now that the finances of the country are suffering from the shock of war. It invokes our patriotism by declaring itself for the purification of party and the just disposition of the nation's patronage. The disguise is thin, and he who looks beneath may see the true lineaments of a monster which will destroy us all.

When the blasts of war blew in our ears the country sprang to arms. When the glittering ranks of rebellion stood before us we knew the country was in danger, and we saw the foe we had to meet. The danger was open, palpable, and undisguised. There was no mistaking the import of that fearful sign. For years the conflict raged, but the cause of liberty prevailed at last. Thousands upon thousands of our flesh and blood were laid in soldiers' graves. They yielded up their lives battling against an enemy which threatened to overturn the Constitution of this land and subvert its liberties. We who survived had fondly hoped that with the last note of the fierce rebellion all perils had passed away. We consoled ourselves for all the tumult that had gone before by the assurance that there would be but serenity and security in all which was to come. But a foe again attacks us; not with a loud proclamation and the open defiance of hostile war; not with brave challenges and trumpet call, invoking to deadly conflict and conquering strife. Clothed in insidiousness which seeks to allay all doubt and silence all suspicion, it presents itself as a benefactor to confer a blessing. With promises of reform upon its lips giving assurance of better and more faithful service to the country it appears in an aspect to enlist our sympathies and engage our favor. If we listen to its allurements and incorporate it into our national system we shall discover its tendency and its purpose only when too late to counteract either. It will not be apparent how great is its enormity, how vicious are its practices, and how poisonous are its influences until we are too far encircled by its coils to shake them off.

For their sakes who died that this country might be preserved to their posterity republican in form and republican in name; that the liberties of this people should still be preserved intact from open violence and secret decay; that there should be no aristocracy created by Government; to the end that as now, for the first time, "all men are free and equal" before the law, the law shall not again adopt another code to make men any less free, I do entreat the condemnation of this House upon this destroying proposition.

The following is the bill to which I have addressed my remarks:

A bill to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act there shall be created a new executive department of the Government of the United States, to be called the Department of the Civil Service; that the head of said Department shall be the Vice President of the United States, or in case of a vacancy in said office, the President of the Senate for the time being, who shall be a member and president of the Board of Commissioners hereinafter created, and shall perform all the duties assigned to him by this act] pertaining thereto.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all appointments of civil officers in the several departments of the service of the United States, except postmasters and such officers as are by law required to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made from those persons who shall have been found best qualified for the performance of the duties of the offices to which such appointments are to be made, in an open and competitive examinations, to be conducted as herein prescribed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a board of four commissioners, who shall hold their offices for the term of five years, to be called the civil service examination board, among whose duties shall be the following:

First. To prescribe the qualifications requisite for an appointment into each branch and grade of the civil service of the United States, having regard to the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter.

Second. To provide for the examinations and periods and conditions of probation of all persons eligible under this act who may present themselves for admission into the civil service.

Third. To establish rules governing the applications of such persons, the times and places of their examinations, the subjects upon which such examinations shall be had, with other incidents thereof, and the mode of conducting the same, and the manner of keeping and preserving the records thereof, and of perpetuating the evidence of such applications, qualifications, examinations, probations, and their result, as they shall think expedient. Such rules shall be so framed as to keep the branches of the civil service and the different grades of each branch, as also the records applicable to each branch, distinct and separate. The said board shall divide the country into territorial districts for the purpose of holding examinations of applicants resident therein and others, and shall designate some convenient and accessible place in each district where examinations shall be held.

Fourth. To examine personally, or by persons by them specially designated, the applicants for appointment into the civil service of the United States.

Fifth. To make report of all rules and regulations established by them, and of a summary of their proceedings, including an abstract of their examinations for the different branches of the service, annually, to Congress at the opening of each session.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all appointments to the civil service provided for in this act shall be made from those who have passed the required examinations and probations in the following order and manner:

First. The applicant who stands highest in order of merit on the list of those who have passed the examination and probation for any particular branch and grade of the civil service shall have the preference in appointment to that branch and grade, and so on, in the order of precedence in examinations and merit during probation to the minimum degree of merit fixed by the board for such grade.

Second. Whenever any vacancy shall occur in any grade of the civil service above the lowest, in any branch, the senior in the next lower grade may be appointed to fill the same, or a new examination for that particular vacancy may be ordered, under the direction of the department, of those in the next lower grade, and the person found best qualified shall be entitled to the appointment to fill such vacancy: Provided, That no person now in office shall be promoted or transferred from a lower to a higher grade unless he shall have passed at least one examination under this act.

Third. The right of seniority shall be determined by the rank of merit assigned by the board upon the examinations, having regard also to seniority in service; but it shall at all times be in the power of the heads of Departments to order new examinations, which shall be conducted by the board, upon due notice, and according to fixed rules, and which shall determine seniority with regard to the persons ordered to be examined, or in the particular branch and grade of the service to which such examinations shall apply.

Fourth. Said board shall have power to establish rules for such special examinations, and also rules by which any person exhibiting particular merit in any branch of the civil service may be advanced one or more points in their respective grades; and one fourth of the promotions may be made on account of merit, irrespective of seniority of service, such merit to be ascertained by special examinations, or by advancement for meritorious services and special fitness for the particular branch of service, according to rules to be established as aforesaid.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That said board shall also have power to prescribe a fee, not exceeding five dollars, to be paid by each applicant for examination, and also a fee, not exceeding ten dollars, to be paid by each person who shall receive a certificate of recommendation for appointment or for promotion, or of seniority, which fees shall be first paid to the collector of internal revenue in the district where the applicant or officer resides or may be examined, to be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States by such collector; and the certificates of payment of fees to collectors shall be forwarded quarterly by the commissioners to the Treasury Department.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That said board shall have power to prescribe, by general rules, what misconduct or inefficiency shall be sufficient for the removal or suspension of all officers who come within the provisions of this act, and also to establish rules for the manner of preferring charges for such misconduct or inefficiency, and for the trial of the accused, and for determining his position pending such trial.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That any one of said commissioners may conduct or superintend any examinations, and the board may call to their assistance in such examinations such men of learning and high character as they may think fit, or, in their discretion, such officers in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States as may be designated from time to time, on application of the board, as assistant to said board by the President or heads of Departments, and in special cases, to be fixed by rules or by resolutions of the board, they may delegate examinations to such persons, to be attended and presided over by one member of said board, or by some person specially designated to preside.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said board may also, upon reasonable notice to the person accused, hear and determine any case of alleged misconduct or inefficiency, under the general rules herein provided for, and in such case shall report to the head of the proper Department their finding in the matter, and may recommend the suspension or dismissal from office of any person found guilty of such misconduct or inefficiency; and such person shall be forthwith suspended or dismissed by the head of such Department pursuant to such recommendation, and from the filing of such report shall receive no compensation for official service except from and after the expiration of any term of suspension recommended by such report.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the salary of each of said commissioners, and the additional salary of the Vice President for performing the duties required of him by this act, shall be $5,000 a year, and the said board may appoint a clerk at a salary of $2,500 a year, and a messenger at a salary of $900 a year; and these sums and the necessary traveling expenses of the commissioners, clerk, and messenger, to be accounted for in detail and verified by affidavit, shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The necessary expenses of any person employed by said commissioners as assistants to be accounted for and verified in like manner, and certified by the board, shall also be paid in like manner.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That any officer in the civil service of the United States, at the date of the passage of this act, other than those excepted in the first section of this act, may be required by the head of the Department in which he serves to appear before said board, and if found not qualified for the place he occupies he shall be reported for dismissal, and be dismissed in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the vacancy shall be filled in manner aforesaid from those who may be found qualified for such grade of office after such examination.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That all citizens of the United States shall be eligible to examination and appointment under the provisions of this act, and the heads of the several Departments may, in their discretion, designate the offices in the several branches of the civil service the duties of which may be performed by females as well as males, and for all such offices females as well as males shall be eligible, and may make application therefor and be examined, recommended, appointed, tried, suspended, and dismissed, in manner aforesaid; and the names of those recommended by the examiners shall be placed upon the lists for appointment and promotion in the order of their merit and seniority, and without distinction, other than as aforesaid, from those of male applicants or officers.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President, and also the Senate, may require any person applying for or recommended for any office which requires confirmation by the Senate to appear before said board and be examined as to his qualifications, either before or after being commissioned; and the result of such examination shall be reported to the President and to the Senate.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That until the confirmation by the Senate of the commissioners authorized to be appointed by this act, the head of said Department is hereby authorized to appoint persons to perform the duties of commissioners temporarily, with the same powers and at the same rate of compensation as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] should have taken the floor to-day in the Committee of the Whole upon the Military Academy bill, to discuss, out of order, the provisions of a bill now on the Speaker's table, soon to be reached in the regular order of business. I trust the committee will bear with me while I reply to a few of the propositions upon which that gentleman has based his attack upon that measure, and to show that they have no foundation whatever in the bill thus attacked. The key-note of the gentleman's attack is that the bill creates offices in this country with a life tenure, which is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and to the wishes of the people, and therefore it should not receive the support of Congress. Now, if members will look at the bill itself they will find that it proposes to do no such thing.

The committee who have had charge of this measure have carefully distinguished the tenure of office created by it in the persons who are within the scope of it from either a tenure of office during good behavior or a tenure of office during life. They have seen enough of the evils of those tenures in the few offices to which they are applicable in this country, and the many offices to which they are applicable in other countries. They adopted, therefore, an entirely distinct ground for this tenure, differing from both the others, and conforming strictly to what has hitherto been deemed entirely within the spirit of our popular institutions. Instead of holding office during good behavior or during life tenure, the incumbent can only hold it during his efficiency of service, an entirely different and distinct thing. In other words, the bill demands of every person entering the service of the Government in these subordinate capacities that he shall render to the people an equivalent for the money which he receives from the people for his services, and that just as soon as from any cause he is unable to render that equivalent he shall be no longer entitled to his place in the public service. What is there anti-republican or anti-democratic in this? It is, perhaps, a harsh tenure of office; but we all hold our places at the will of the people, and just so long as they consider us fit to serve them and no longer. Whenever they deem us unfit or incompetent, that instant we are discharged. At the present time the tenure of office in the Departments is at the caprice of the superior; it may be for a day, it may be for a year, or it may be for life. These offices really have no tenure, and consequently no character and no respectability. If the gentleman will look at the tenth section of this bill, he will find that these commissioners have power to prescribe by general rules what "misconduct or inefficiency shall be sufficient to authorize the removal or suspension of all officers" coming within the provisions of this act. When those rules are established what becomes of the accusation of a life tenure? It never had any existence, Mr. Chairman, except in the brain of the member who just spoken. All will agree (even the gentleman who takes care to lay down the proposition that such is the foundation of this bill) that the people should be well served in these minor offices; that the Government, as the agent of the people, is bound to procure the best services they can for the money they pay. All will agree that some machinery should be devised by which the services of properly qualified persons can be obtained. No one wishes this country or this people ill served. No one wishes the money of the people to be squandered upon incompetent or inefficient officers, or upon favorites of this or that President or head of Department. All ask that proper service shall be rendered, and that proper persons should be selected to render such service while they continue to have the ability to do so. Hence the gentleman agrees, as all must agree, (and this accounts for his allusion to the unanimity of the press and the people on this subject,) that any measure calculated to improve the character of the service and bring into it those best fitted to perform its duties, is a measure that should command the respect of the people and be adopted by their Representatives. The gentleman agrees that in a certain degree this does that; but his objection is founded upon the mode of getting rid of these servants. I have shown that there is not the least foundation for the charge which he makes. There is to be found in the bill no such thing as this scarecrow of tenure of office during good behavior or for life, which the gentleman has referred to so often.

There is another point upon which the latter part of the gentleman's argument rested, and that is, that the bill elevates the Vice President of this Government to be the equal, if not the superior, of the President in the dispensing of patronage and the appointment to office. Perhaps, after what has been said, the House will be surprised to hear that under this bill the Vice President of the United States has no patronage or appointing power whatever. These commissioners are stripped of all appointing power. The Vice President has, to be sure, the appointment of his clerk and messenger, as the head of a department. He has not the appointment of any other officer within the scope of the provisions of this bill nor under this Government. What has been said on this topic, if it was intended to have any effect, was aimed at the future incumbent of the Vice Presidential office rather than at the bill itself. The functions of this commission are, in the first place, to prescribe the qualifications for office, not as the candidates come forward to meet individual cases; but by general rules for classes of offices and the different grades throughout the country, in the customs, in the Departments, in the internal revenue, and elsewhere. These regulations are required to be reported to Congress, and Congress may establish or affirm or amend or alter them by law; but without action by Congress they are binding. After the establishment of these regulations all that the commission has to do is to see that every person applying for official position possesses the prescribed qualifications. Now, it should be presumed, I submit, that a commission having at its head the second officer of the Government (and who that officer is to be we know) will discharge its duty faithfully, and will ascertain in all cases fairly and impartially the fitness of these candidates.

Mr. Chairman, this passing upon the qualifications of candidates for situations under the Government is not controlled by political favor and does not result in political patronage. No, sir; it is a judicial act, so made and recorded in each case, and according to that judgment the name of the candidate will go upon the list of those from whom selections are to be made for clerkships and other situations, or be omitted from it. And this record is to be kept so that the fairness of the decision may be inquired into and criticised at any and all times. Perhaps if the Vice President had the power absolutely to appoint these commissioners there would be some suspicion and some show of ground for the charge that the gentleman has made. But, sir, on the contrary, the man to whom he is said to be a rival has the appointment of these commissioners with the confirmation of the Senate. They are independent of the Vice President, and will act independently in the discharge of their duties it is to be presumed, as other persons appointed in the same way, such as the judges of our courts and other high officers of the Government.

Here are two main propositions upon which the gentleman has based his speech which have no foundation in the bill itself, and his other objections, it seems to me, are equally imaginary. If he had studied the bill and report carefully (and I am bound to believe him as an honorable gentleman when he says that he has read it) I am confident he would have seen the error of his propositions.

Let us now consider the next proposition which he dwelt upon. He says that this measure would be impracticable in operation. Suppose this commission appointed, the Vice President at its head, and one hundred and fifty or two hundred clerks are needed in the Departments at Washington. Suppose the rules established and the qualifications prescribed. Let us see what sort of an "aristocracy" this measure creates. The information that the Government of the United States needs clerks is transmitted to the country. Those who wish to enter into the public service and believe they possess the requisite qualifications are invited to appear before this commission at a certain time and place. Who come there? Those nominated by members of Congress, those nominated by local politicians or State committees, or those of any class or party? By no means. The door of the great civil service examination hall of this country is to be thrown open to every citizen. Every man who believes that he can serve his country in a place that may be vacant has the right to compete with every other man for that place. And, sir, it is the duty of these commissioners to see that the Government gets out of these applicants the best man for the place. The competent are selected, the incompetent and unworthy are rejected. Is this impracticable? It strikes me that it is a most eminently practical measure. If men of ordinary intelligence and integrity are placed upon this commission, with the Vice President at their head, we must presume that they will see that justice is done to the public service and to every one seeking to enter the public service. Where is the opportunity for favor, where for patronage, where for any and all the sources of corruption that the gentleman admits have stained the whole current of our civil service? We stop corruption at the fountain, where hitherto the purity of the stream has been stained.

The gentleman hints at what has been repeatedly said by others in opposition to this measure, why cannot the President and the heads of Departments do this under the existing law? Because, Mr. Chairman, this country has grown beyond the limits of personal knowledge on the part of its chief officers of the qualification of its citizens for holding office. The President cannot now, as in Jefferson's time, become acquainted with the whole body of civil officers, then seven hundred men to whom Jefferson granted commissions. The President to-day grants or authorizes the granting of commissions to upward of sixty thousand persons. If he undertook to do it himself it would absorb his whole time, and the task is beyond the ability of any one man. But, Mr. Chairman, this bill provides the means of relieving the President and heads of Departments from this arduous duty, which under existing law falls upon them, consuming their time, exhausting their strength, and impairing their efficiency for the transaction of the graver business of their offices. We relieve them of that duty altogether, and provide at the same time suitable means for the selection of competent men for appointment to places under the Government. Nor will any harm or confusion arise from this addition to the governmental machinery. This Government has grown to such an immense size that something of this sort has become absolutely necessary to relieve the President and heads of Departments. This measure is not a part of the political machinery merely, but it is judicial or semi-judicial in its application to the ascertainment of the qualifications or fitness of persons for office.

If we look at the propositions which I have stated in detail every one will admit that it is of the first importance that not only the President but each head of a Department having the appointing power of these inferior officers should be able to select the best men that can possibly be found for his service. But how can the Secretary of the Treasury make such selection at the present time with the nominal appointment of two thirds of the officers of the Government, exclusive of the Post Office Department? He would be overborne by applications exactly as the President is and has been. Appointments then become, as we have found them in most cases, a matter of personal and political favor, and the interest of the Government in the fitness of persons for service, has been in a great measure overlooked. Therefore, when we strip this measure of all fanciful exaggeration given to it by the gentleman from Illinois, we find it one of the most simple and practical that could possibly be proposed. There is no difficulty in its constitution, none in its operation, and if these commissioners are honest and intelligent there can be none in its results.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire to make an inquiry of my friend, if it will not interrupt the line of his argument.

Mr. JENCKES. I will hear the question now.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. This bill is one that has attracted a great deal of the attention of the country, as its importance demands that it should, and I desire now to have the benefit of the views of the distinguished gentleman who reported it in regard to what I find contained in the first section. It is there provided that from and after the passage of this act there shall be created a new executive department of the Government, to be called the department of the civil service, at the head of which shall be the Vice President of the United States, or in case of vacancy in that office, the President of the Senate for the time being. Now, the first inquiry I wish to make is, whether my friend holds that it is competent for us to provide by law that a member of the Senate of the United States—for the President pro tempore of that body is, as matter of fact, a member of it—shall become the head of a Department? And in answer to that question I invite his attention to what, of course, is exceedingly familiar to him and to everybody else here, that the principal officers of the Departments are constitutional officers named by the Constitution, and upon whom the President may call for information in writing as the head of a Department. Another provision of the Constitution is, that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office, the provision, of course, amounting to that, it being that no person who is a member of either House of Congress shall be appointed to any other office.

My next inquiry is whether it is in harmony with the spirit, if it be indeed with the letter, of the Constitution to provide that the Vice President, who, under the Constitution, in the contingencies enumerated, may become President, shall be by law constituted a head of a Department, which Department in the next week or next day he may be called upon or required by the Constitution to ask information from? Again, I would inquire whether the gentleman thinks it wise to provide that the man who by the Constitution of the United States is required all the time that Congress is in session to be President of the Senate shall, during the same time, also be at the head of one of the executive departments of the Government, a constitutional office of the very highest importance; an officer in whom, as the gentleman has just said, Congress by the Constitution may vest the appointing power of all the inferior officers of the Government? It is to this particular feature of the bill that I call the attention of the gentleman. I am in favor of the bill as I am now advised, with this exceptional provision to which I have alluded.

Mr. JENCKES. With regard to the first question there may be some difference of opinion, whether the President of the Senate, in the case of a vacancy in the office of Vice President is in the sense of the Constitution, or within the meaning of the Constitution a member of the Senate and excluded from holding any other office or the performance of any other duties. That, however, is a provision of the bill which is of no great importance. In regard to the other question, it seems to me entirely clear that it is proper for Congress to clothe the Vice President with other powers and require of him the performance of other duties than those referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, and not only that, but that it is eminently fit that it should be done. He is now of no importance to the Government except to preside over the Senate. I do not understand that he is required to be in the Senate all the time. They may appoint a President pro tempore in his absence, and they may continue that officer as long as they please during the absence of the incumbent of the office of Vice President. But in regard to the other subdivision of the question, it seems to me of the utmost importance that the Vice President should be in the service, should know something of the Administration, be put in the line of succession, and be able to perform intelligently the duties of the office to which he may succeed, and there is no place in the Government where he can serve with greater efficiency than at the head of the department of the civil service, which will bring him in contact with all the civil officers of the Government.

I have answered these questions before, and without taking up further time of the House I refer him to what has been said heretofore in previous debates on the same questions. I expected, knowing the gentleman's fairness in the consideration of these subjects, and his eminent patriotism, that he would be in favor of the general provisions of a measure like this, and that it would meet the approbation of all who fairly consider it and understand its sphere in the Government and its effect upon the future administration of it.

There is another aspect not put by the gentleman from Illinois directly, but which it may be well to consider with regard to this tenure of office, and that is to contrast it with the present tenure of office. Now appointments are made altogether by favor. Merit is a secondary consideration. Patronage is at the root of all that is done with regard to appointments, and we have the consequences of it in our system. If the gentleman thinks that the present practice is one of the merits of our republican Government I disagree with him entirely. I take issue with him and all others who maintain that proposition squarely. I say that the present mode of appointment is one which we have derived from monarchies and foreign nations, and is not an invention of the Republic or the outgrowth of republican institutions. And when the gentleman points to the history of these reforms in other countries he most strangely overlooks its origin in two great nations. In France this system does not date from the old monarchy. It was one of the gifts of the first republic. The decree establishing competitive examinations and the ascertainment of the fitness of persons for office was a decree of the Constituent Assembly, and not a decree of the king. And in England, instead of its being carried by those who have had the patronage and appointments hitherto, instead of being an outgrowth of the aristocracy of that country, it was established by an order of the queen in council, without consulting the House of Lords or the House of Commons, or any other branch of the Government except the executive branch.

The origin of the system in England dates back only to 1853, and the two persons who get the chief credit of it and to whom it is cheerfully conceded by all who have considered the matter, are Lord Macaulay, then recently returned from India, and the present chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Robert Lowe. They studied the subject of the civil service in India, and first established rules and regulations by which officers should be sent to that great country, and they based their system upon the principle of open and general competition. When it was introduced into the home service it was limited, and those examined were only those nominated for examination by members of Parliament or by the heads of departments at the suggestion of members of Parliament. So that in the home service of England they do not have this system as it is reported here. We have reported what the civil service commissioners of England have been asking Parliament to grant them for the last ten years. They ask that open competition shall be allowed in the home service, as it is in the India service, to all the queen's subjects, and we propose that the doors of our public service shall be open to every citizen of the United States. Therefore this proposed measure of which the gentleman complains, and to which he attempts to affix the stigma of "aristocratic growth," is eminently republican and democratic. It is the same that was secured to the people of one country while their Government was republican, and in another country by the wise officers of a board having charge of a service where efficiency and integrity had become of the utmost importance to that long-plundered and misgoverned people, the people of India.

Nor can I conceive, Mr. Chairman, why any person should seek to prolong the present system. The results of it are admitted by all. The Government does not under it get competent servants. They are nominated by persons who exercise the power of nomination as incident to their offices, or because of their political distinction, and in the way of patronage, and with very little regard to the wants of the service. We consider it in private life the greatest disservice one man can render another to recommend to his employment a dishonest or incapable servant. Now, who would wish to continue a system by which there is imposed upon our people incompetent or dishonest officers in every branch of the service? Is it our patriotism that inspires us to this? It seems to me that patriotism should inspire us to do exactly the reverse, and to seek to establish some measure that would prevent this corruption and destroy this evil.

Nor do I see why in this Government the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" should any longer be continued. That has been the popular name given to this change of office, this rotation in office in the minor offices, ever since the practice was established. Let us look at the changed condition of the country between 1829 and 1869. In 1829 the expenses of the Government were paid out of the receipts of customs. Not only that, but all the interest upon the public debt was so paid, and the national debt itself was in process of payment and cancellation, and was actually canceled within a few years after that time out of these receipts. It made little difference to the people then who had the salaries of offices, or who had the appointments to office, when they had no burdens to bear, when the question of a greater or less expense in the administration of the Government meant only a little additional duty on silks, champagnes, and the other luxuries on which those duties were levied. Then the people cared very little for these spoils, because the plunder did not come from them, but from the rich consumers of those imported luxuries.

At the present time, however, the Government is burdened with a large debt, and the receipts from customs barely pay the interest on the debt. There are no means of paying the debt, or canceling any portion of it, except by direct and long continued taxation; and no one can say when the end of that taxation will be. The spoils scattered among these officeholders; the streams of money which should flow into the Treasury, but which because of the unfaithfulness of some of these officers are diverted into their pockets and the pockets of their confederates, all this treasure is wrung from the toil of the people. The spoils of office are now the spoil of the toil of the laborer and workingman, the spoil of the means of every man of property and tax-payer in the country.

How long do gentlemen think the people will allow this system to continue, when we have had laid before us within the last two years document after document showing that of the tax on whisky $100,000,000 which is actually due to the Government and which should have been paid into the Treasury has been diverted into the pockets of officeholders and their confederates, and has never reached its proper destination, the public Treasury; when report after report has shown to this House and to the country such gigantic frauds as could not be perpetrated except with the connivance of Government officials; when they see the whole service thus degraded and demoralized, and those who are honest, upright, and faithful in the discharge of their duties either driven out or overborne, while those who pay their taxes conscientiously are obliged not only to pay their own just burdens, but to contribute also the amount thus stolen by those who are plundering the Treasury? How long do you think the people will bear patiently this cry, "To the victors belong the spoils?"—spoils that are torn from their backs and wrung from their labor? They see, Mr. Chairman, who it is that obstructs this reform and why it is obstructed. It is because there is in this country a class of people, some elevated to office, and many expecting to be, who wish to use this patronage of the Government as the means of obtaining office; who wish to use the positions they may obtain not only to turn money into their own pockets but to allow others, their political friends, to divert it to their own and to political uses.

Instead of destroying or tending to destroy the fabric of republican institutions this measure, it seems to me, tends to turn aside and entirely paralyze all the efforts of their enemies. The foundations of our institutions are to be sapped and weakened, the structure is to be made to crumble and fall, by the insidious efforts of those who take away from the Government its life-blood, the money, the taxes by which it is supported and carried on. Let us have this measure, Mr. Chairman; let this commission sit at the doors of our custom-houses, and we shall have no smuggling in the great ports or the small ports, no swindling in the excise on whisky and tobacco; we shall know who the inspectors and the watchmen, who the gaugers and storekeepers are, and that they possess the requisite qualifications for their offices. We shall give them an incentive to obtain, by faithful service, promotion and rewards. We shall give to all who deal with the Government the assurance that they will be met by honest men, and not by those who will plunder and rob them and cheat the Government at every stage of the transaction of their business.

It is as an economical measure, Mr. Chairman, that this measure emanates from the Committee on Retrenchment. It is attacked as a political measure by the member from Illinois from a politician's stand-point. As a political measure, here and against him, but from another stand-point, I defend it, claiming that it is one by which this Government and our republican institutions can be more strengthened than by any that has been proposed within the last half century. It will restore our institutions and our offices to the spirit in which those institutions were created and those offices established. For corruption it will give us purity, for venality it will substitute honor. It will give to every one of our civil servants the character that is now shared by every one who serves the Republic in the military or the naval service. It will develop an esprit de corps which will afford a potent resistance to all temptations, which will lead every man bearing the commission of the Government to perform his duty honestly and patriotically.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of taking any part in this debate at the present time. I do intend, however, with the consent of the House, to take an early opportunity of expressing some views in regard to this civil service bill, which I regard as the most important measure that has been presented to the public for some time. In one respect this bill has been treated as no other proposed law has been treated for years. It has been published far and near; it has been discussed in reviews, in magazines, and on the stump, in a form and to an extent altogether unprecedented. These things have called to the measure my attention, in common with that of other members. I wish, therefore, an opportunity to say something in regard to the bill. In general I concur with the views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I believe that the bill, though well designed, is a mischievous measure, and one altogether unworthy to be enacted into a law. At the present time I am not prepared to enter into the discussion of the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the pending bill be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If no gentleman desires to offer any amendment I will move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before that is done I would like to make an inquiry in regard to one matter in connection with these appropriations for the Military Academy. I would like to know what is the recommendation of the committee in regard to repairs of the wharf? I ought, perhaps, to call attention to the fact that about a year ago an appropriation was asked for the repair of the wharf, and it was at that time stated by a gentleman on this floor that, living in the district, he knew all about this wharf, and that it did not need any repairs whatever. It turns out that the appropriation was for the upper wharf, for heavy ordnance, and not the one intended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We made the appropriation last year. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HURLBURD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 1596, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bill No. 174, for the relief of Mrs. Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana; when the Speaker signed the same.

ADJOURNMENT OVER—AGAIN.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over till Monday next; and also move that that motion be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw my motion.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Congressional Printer be, and is hereby, directed to inform this House the cause of delay in furnishing for distribution the Agricultural Report for 1867.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the President's message of 1867.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, by unanimous consent, that no further business be done this evening after coming out of committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WASHBURN's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message of 1867.

RESULTS OF THE ELECTION.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Chairman, the issues supposed to have been settled by the election of General Grant to the Presidency formed the subject of an elaborate speech by the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] a few days before the adjournment of Congress for the holidays in December. The assumptions of the gentleman on that occasion, which differ materially from my own conclusions, have suggested the brief remarks which I propose to make upon this the first opportunity I have had for a reply. Nor is this an idle discussion; for what has been clearly and fairly determined by a general election ought to be acquiesced in as the declared will of the people, binding upon the minority and regulating the official duty of those elected by the majority.

The late presidential election decided, of course, that the Republican party should continue to administer the Government through an elected Chief Magistrate of their own choice and a majority of the Forty-First Congress. But it settled scarcely anything else than what is practically inseparable from such a result. The election, in fact, turned upon a false and imaginary issue, as I shall presently show, by which the Republican party succeeded in avoiding a direct verdict of the people upon the real questions involved in the policy upon which they had administered the Government. By the same means they avoided, as far as possible, commitment upon any question which could be referred to the future. As an example of the latter, as well as an illustration of the unwarranted assumptions of the gentleman from Maine, take the subject of the finances. In the speech to which I have adverted the gentleman said "the election of General Grant has settled the financial question." Settled it how? Why, says the gentleman, "it has settled that the public debt shall be paid in the utmost good faith, according to the letter and spirit of the contract."

This, to be sure, is in the very words of the Chicago platform, and neither more nor less explicit. But when and by what party was it ever made a question whether the national debt should not be paid in the utmost good faith and according to the letter and spirit of the contract? What is good faith and what the letter and spirit of the contract are the very points of the controversy, and upon these the Republican platform and the enunciations of General Grant leave us as much as ever in the dark. The late Thaddeus Stevens, whose leadership of the Republican majority in this House was conspicuous, and who was in his lifetime as much entitled to speak for the Republican party as the gentleman from Maine, declared in one of his last speeches in this Hall that the Republican platform meant that "the bloated bondholders," as he styled the holders of five-twenties, should be paid in currency and not in gold. But this, says Horace Greeley, is "villainy." And so thinks the gentleman from Maine. On the other hand, an honorable Senator, [Mr. MORTON,] a high Republican authority, and prominently named even for the Secretaryship of the Treasury under the new Administration, maintains that to pay the bonds in currency is a clear legal right according to the contract. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who will concede nothing in Republican orthodoxy even to the gentleman from Maine, goes further, and says that to pay in greenbacks is not only a legal right but a moral duty.

In reference to the question touching the resumption of specie payment we discover the same confusion among the Republican oracles. "Let resumption come at once," says the venerable editor of the Tribune in his late letter addressed to the distinguished Republican Senator already referred to. "Wages must fall, property sell cheaper or be unsalable, the sheriff and constable be after many of us. We must suffer anyhow. But," continues he with heroic emphasis, "I prefer to take the plunge at once and be done with it." "But," retorts the honorable Senator, "you may be ready to make the plunge, but the great body of the people are not. Postpone till 1871." "Postpone indefinitely," says the gentleman from Massachusetts. It appears from this that the interpretation of the settlement of the financial question by the election of General Grant is attended with as much confusion of tongues as prevailed among the artificers of Babel. The fact is that the election has left the financial question practically where it found it. All that the election has certainly settled in relation thereto is that the party which has swelled the national debt by unprecedented extravagance and deranged the currency by unwise legislation shall, for at least two years longer, shoulder the responsibility of providing a remedy. The financial elephant, for the present, is their prize. So much of finance has been settled by the election of General Grant, and nothing more.

The gentleman lays it down as an inevitable consequence of General Grant's election that negro suffrage must be accepted as a permanent establishment in the southern States, "and at no distant day throughout the entire Union." Yet if negro suffrage, which is the very corner-stone of Radical reconstruction, had been divested of all other issues and fairly submitted to the vote of the whole people, what man acquainted with the national sentiment will deny that its defeat would have been overwhelming? No other proof is needed to establish this proposition than the decisive vote upon this question when lately presented by itself in several of the great Republican States of the North and the continued exclusion of negroes from the polls in nearly all of them.

It is said, however, that negro suffrage "is of necessity conceded as one of the essentials of reconstruction." But has the Radical policy of reconstruction itself been so approved and established that it can never be disturbed by future elections? Is there nothing to be apprehended from the continued violation of natural laws and a possible collision of races?

Are the reconstruction laws themselves so firmly intrenched upon constitutional grounds that a general revulsion of feeling among the superior race might not find a ready excuse for sweeping from its foundations the whole work of Radical reconstruction? Radicalism has not itself been overscrupulous in the use of means. Usurpation is a dangerous game for any party to play if it would have its work outlast the passions from which it derived its power to tyrannize and proscribe.

Of course, the late elections have continued in the hands of the Republican party the power to enforce their policy for two years longer. But now, since the election of General Grant has in the eyes of all men insured the safety of the Union, there will be less excuse for sectional and personal proscription. Those caricatures of republican government imposed by the stranger and the negro upon the disfranchised white race of the South had become abhorrent to the public mind of the North long before the late presidential election. But the shadowy ghost of an extinct rebellion filled the popular imagination with false alarms and frightened it from that forgiveness which had become both safe and merciful. In so far, therefore, as the late elections have continued the power of Radicalism it was a verdict extorted from the fears of the people rather than their judgment upon the merits of the Radical policy. Public confidence turned to Grant as the unsuspected representative of a triumphant Union, and the Republican party was saved through him alone. Had he been the candidate of the Opposition, whom could radicalism have elected over him? Look to the October elections. Let the imminent danger which threatened radicalism, even with Grant as its candidate, answer the question. No other name given under heaven among men could have saved the Republican party from overwhelming defeat and final condemnation. Was it because Grant was the representative of Radicalism that worked this great salvation? Everybody knows better. Radicalism had been already repudiated, as the State and municipal elections in the North had for two years indicated. Even after the sagacious nomination at Chicago the handwriting was still seen on the wall. Even over against the name of Grant, resplendent as it was with military glory, the gathering cloud of threatened disaster lowered. There were names before the Democratic National Convention at New York which thrilled with apprehension the Republican heart every time the electric wires flashed through the land the Democratic roll-call of the States.

I shall not pause to review the blunders from which others reaped a harvest which they did not sow. Nor shall I calculate how many grains of common sense were needed in the balance in which Democratic victory was that day weighted down. I only refer to the irrevocable past for the lesson which it teaches to your party, Mr. Chairman, rather than to mine. The argument which I desire to draw from it is this: that the elements of Republican success at the late elections were derived from other sources than the popular approval of the Radical policy. It was the misfortune of my party, Mr. Chairman, to expose itself to misrepresentation. It was the fortune of yours to take advantage of it, and to be permitted to inscribe with popular approbation the winning words, "Let us have peace" upon the banners of the party which had for nearly four years in a time of profound peace continued the worst consequences of war. But the glaring contradiction was not regarded, and everywhere the Republican press and the Republican orators proclaimed to the people that the real question was whether the rebellion should be renewed by a victorious Democracy, or peace and union insured by the election of General Grant. And now, having answered its purpose, false and imaginary as the issue was, I insist that it shall be held within the scope of its logical application, and I maintain that nothing ought to be considered as settled by the election of General Grant except that the rebellion shall not be renewed.

But, said the gentleman from Maine, rising higher in his flight toward the regions of pure imagination, "With the election of General Grant comes a higher standard of American citizenship, with more dignity and character to the name abroad and more assured liberty and security attaching to it at home." High sounding phrases, indeed. But no new standard of citizenship has been set up by General Grant, and if we are compelled to seek for this boasted standard of American citizenship in the reconstruction policy of Congress, what do we find? Taking up the latest illustration of Radical reconstruction, the constitution just prepared and ready to be fastened upon the people of Virginia, (twenty-five thousand of whom are excluded from the polls this day,) I read in it that no inhabitant of that State shall hold any State office unless he first takes an oath to recognize and accept the political equality of the negro. Neither shall any one who will not take this oath be qualified to serve on a jury.

I find in the constitution of Alabama, rejected by the people of that State, but afterward, nevertheless, imposed upon them by Congress, the same oath prescribed as a condition precedent to the registration of a voter. The same test for the qualification of a voter exists in Arkansas and in Louisiana, and in the constitution proposed for Mississippi, the temporary rejection of which has led to the continued exclusion of the latter State from representation in Congress. Georgia having been admitted to representation, is now threatened with expulsion unless she will allow negroes to sit in her Legislature.

In some form in all the reconstructed States of the South fidelity to the dogma of a party is thus made the test of American citizenship. Upon condition of allegiance to the Republican party, however, all former rebels against the Government, however red-handed, are to be forgiven and exalted. The constitution of Arkansas, for example, provides that certain classes of ex-rebels shall not register as voters, including those, in express terms, who during the late rebellion violated the rules of civilized warfare. But all of them shall vote notwithstanding, even those who, in violation of the rules of civilized warfare, deliberately murdered Union prisoners in cold blood, or helped to destroy them by lingering tortures in prison pens, "provided"—and I now quote the very words of the constitution approved by Congress—"provided that all persons included," &c., (in the disfranchised classes) "who have openly advocated, or who have voted for the reconstruction proposed by Congress, and accept the equality of all men before the law shall be deemed qualified electors under this constitution."

If we turn to the constitution of Louisiana we find similar proscriptions and pardons. No traitor is there too black for Radical absolution provided he will swear that the negro is his political equal, and he can ventilate his loyalty under that clause of the Louisiana constitution which takes all the disfranchised Radicals out of the lists of the proscribed by the accommodating proviso "that no person who, prior to the 1st of January, 1868, favored the execution of the laws of the United States popularly known as the reconstruction acts of Congress, and openly and actively assisted the loyal men of the State (to wit, the Radicals) in their efforts to restore Louisiana to her position in the Union, shall be held to be included among those herein excepted." Among the proscribed I find those who in the advocacy of the rebellion wrote or published a newspaper article or preached a sermon during the war. They shall not vote in Louisiana unless they are in favor of the reconstruction policy of Congress, and swear to the doctrine of negro equality. But they who, in the advocacy of treason, wrote it in bloody characters with their swords and preached sermons against the Union through the cannon's mouth, they shall, nevertheless, be clothed with all the attributes of citizenship in the State, provided they will swear allegiance to negro equality, and have been willing to aid in the enforcement of Radical reconstruction.

In further illustration of these sublime tests of loyalty and citizenship, in their operation even upon northern men, let me suppose a case, of which there may be many examples now and likely to be many more hereafter. Suppose a northern citizen of the United States, who, as a volunteer soldier of the Union Army during the civil war, had done his share toward the redemption of our common country, and, with the idea of improving his fortunes, should emigrate to one of the southern States—to Arkansas, for example, or to Louisiana. After residing there the requisite time, suppose he were to offer to register as a voter. The first test of qualification to which he would be subjected would be the oath in favor of negro equality. If, by reason of his convictions of the unsoundness and impolicy of the doctrine of negro equality, he could not conscientiously take the oath, disfranchisement would be the inevitable penalty. Nor would a shattered constitution, broken down in the service of his country, nor a limb lost, it may be, in fighting the battles of the Union, save him from being driven from the polls. But not so would it happen under the new dispensation to the rebel who had shed the blood and shot off the limb of this disfranchised Union soldier. The rebel can vote, however red his hand has been with Union blood, provided he is willing to swear that he is politically no better than a negro, and has advocated and voted for the reconstruction policy of Congress. Beneath the level of such a yoke, and through such partisan crevices must hundreds of thousands of disfranchised white men creep before they can become the political equals of the negro or make their present fidelity to their country of any avail.

Such are the new tests of loyalty and suffrage which Radical reconstruction has prescribed, exemplifying that higher standard of American citizenship which the gentleman from Maine so grandiloquently prefigured.

By such tenures is American citizenship held in more than ten States of the Federal Union. Such are the standards prescribed by a party which retains power by the votes of black barbarians and the wholesale disfranchisement of white conservatives. It can no longer be said that the three hundred thousand white men who have been stripped of their rights of citizenship by the acts of this Congress are thus degraded because of their former rebellion. This will not be believed when enabling acts are constantly being passed by Congress removing the political disabilities of subservient rebels by hundreds and thousands, while from these bills of amnesty the name of every suspected conservative is first carefully expunged, as if he were afflicted with political leprosy. The iron-clad oath has long ago become but a spike upon which to impale conservatives. There are Representatives from southern States with seats on this floor, in full fellowship and communion with the Radical majority, from whose bodies the Union bullets have never been extracted, and who bear upon their persons the scars of wounds received in their desperate endeavors to capture and destroy this very Capitol where, as loyal men, they now sit in judgment. They succeeded in capturing the Capitol, not with rebel bullets, but by the aid of Radical ballots.

I have no charges to make against these gentlemen. I complain not of their presence here, for I am in favor of universal amnesty. But that they should be here to the exclusion of others, not by virtue of their obedience to the laws and their renewed allegiance to the Union, but solely because they have prostrated themselves before the Radical idol and shout the shibboleth of a party, conveys to the mind no very exalted idea of the advancing standard of impartial American citizenship.

To affirm that this condition of things has received the deliberate approval of either General Grant or of the majority which elected him I believe to be a slander against both.

"Among those things lost with the 'lost cause,' by the defeat of Mr. Seymour, the gentleman enumerates what he is pleased to term 'the paradise of State rights.'"

If, however, it be claimed as one of the results of the late election that States have no longer any rights which the Federal power is bound to respect, there will be many a fierce struggle before the party of centralization will be left in undisputed possession of the Government. Secession was a heresy which threatened the existence of the Union, but the denial to the States of those reserved rights which clearly lie on their side of the line, defining the constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal authority, would destroy the symmetry and distinguishing excellence of our institutions, to preserve which would be worth as great a sacrifice as the suppression of the rebellion against the Union itself.

I know not through what future convulsions the ultimate destiny of the Republic is to be wrought out, nor how far the new President, naturally conservative and sagacious, may be willing and able to aid in the restoration of fraternal feeling and public confidence throughout all sections. I know not how successfully General Grant may be able to check the wasteful extravagance of the public expenditures and aid in the restoration of a sound currency, and open up before the eyes of his anxious and tax-burdened countrymen a prospect of the early reduction of the public debt by the practice of that economy which is so essential, but to which, under the republican rule, the country has been so long a stranger. Nor can I tell how far, if he should in all these things be disposed to act for his country instead of his party, he will regard his obligations to the latter paramount if they should happen to disagree with the former. He has hitherto been credited with views broader and more national than the policy of his party. Considering how immeasurably the Republican party is his debtor he can well afford to preserve his individuality. He need not sink, unless he chooses, into the mere stalking horse of party, the mere dispenser of party patronage—the gilded figure-head in a State pageant, like a doge of Venice, subject to his council of ten. If he is ambitious to crown his warlike fame with enduring civic renown he will be far more than all this. He can be more than all this without having attributed to him any special love for the party that voted against him. He will, it must be expected, give the offices to the men who voted him into the Presidency. Nor can he be expected to betray any of the pledges which his Republican candidacy have fairly imposed upon him. But he is too wise not to see that he owes to the Republican party the nomination alone. They owe him everything beside. Without him they would have been nothing, and they know it.

In view of these considerations it is complimentary to him to doubt how far he will submit his official locks to be shorn by the Radical Delilah, and allow himself to be bound by the wishes of the civil tenure law or by any new inventions, which upon the first exhibition of independent action on his part, Congress may deem it expedient to devise for his restriction. It would be in accordance at least with the popular conception of his character if he should defend with resolution the constitutional prerogatives of his office. If he were to imitate Congress he might even go beyond this, and become a law unto himself.

When by his official utterances the new President shall have broken his sphinx-like silence, and revealed a policy of his own, then, and not till then, can it be safely asserted how much or how little has been accomplished by the election of General Grant.

The great constitutional and national party to which I belong, numbering in its ranks this day, notwithstanding the election of General Grant, a majority of the white people of the entire country, will continue to move on, never despairing of the Republic, faithful to its great mission and strong in its abiding convictions of right. It will never cease its efforts until, with or without the aid of General Grant, it shall behold the civil law supreme throughout the land, and this nation again united as one people with the equality, dignity, and rights of the several States reestablished and secured.

Mr. CULLOM obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. CHANLER, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PRICE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the President's annual message of 1867, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the sugar refiners of Philadelphia, asking for a new classification of sugars for tariff purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan; which I ask may be read and printed, and lie on the table. I will state that it passed unanimously through both branches of the Legislature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

A joint resolution asking the Congress of the United States to pass the tariff bill now pending in the Senate for the relief of copper mining.

Whereas foreign ores, mostly the product of peon and slave labor, have to a large extent been imported and continue to be imported into the United States at a nominal rate of duty, to wit, five per cent. ad valorem; and whereas the rates of duty on all articles which enter into copper mining are so high as to make the discrimination in favor of foreign ores and against copper mined in this country palpably unequal, unjust, and most oppressive to the copper mining interests of the United States; and whereas the State of Michigan is largely interested in the production of copper, and the mines of Michigan, in consequence of such unequal taxation and of the competition growing out of the importation of such foreign ores, are in a greatly depressed and prostrated condition; more than three fourths of the active mining companies have suspended work altogether, causing great distress among a hard-working and industrious population, entirely dependent on the working of the mines for support, and also preventing the development of the greater mineral wealth of our State; and whereas a bill for the relief of the copper mining interest of our country, which interest is one of the most important in this State, has passed the House of Representatives by a vote of more than two thirds of its members, and is now pending in the Senate; and whereas iron, lead, and other mineral products of the United States are protected by a duty of about fifty per cent., while foreign copper ores under present rates pay five per cent. only; and whereas the bill now pending in Congress calls for a duty of only twelve to fifteen per cent. ad valorem: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan in Legislature assembled, That the Senate of the United States be, and are hereby, most respectfully but earnestly and specially called upon to give this most important measure, now in their hands, a favorable consideration; and the Senators from Michigan are hereby instructed, and our Representatives in Congress are requested, to use all honorable means to promote the passage of the bill referred to.

MORGAN BATES,

President of the Senate,

[SEAL] J. J. WOODMAN,

Speaker of the House of Representatives,

Approved:

HENRY P. BALDWIN,

Governor of the State of Michigan.

By the Governor:

SAMUEL H. ROW,

Deputy Secretary of State.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. I present a memorial signed by about fifty or more distinguished citizens, being composed of professors of our colleges and mining schools and leading citizens and experts in metallurgy, who pray for the appointment of a commission to visit the mines of Europe and report upon the mode of treating ores containing the precious metals. This is a very important communication; and for the convenience of the committee, as it is a brief one, I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be printed if there be no objection, and it will be so referred.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a petition of citizens of Georgia, setting forth that it is impossible for an avowed Union man to live in the rural districts of that State; that in other portions of the State a man may entertain Union sentiments, but dare not proclaim them; that it is impossible to bring to justice the assassins or murderers of Union men; that intimidation, fraud, and violence are employed to force a certain class of citizens of Georgia to vote contrary to their interests and inclinations; that palpable and indiscriminate violations of the provisions of the fourteenth article amendatory of the Constitution of the United States are committed; that legislation is absolutely necessary, but the petitioners do not presume to advise as to what legislation is necessary. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial signed by Garrett Guest, Henry C. Monroe, William Newkirk, and Colonel William Budd, aged respectively eighty-eight, eighty-two, seventy-seven, and eighty years, asking for pensions to the old soldiers of the war of 1812. They say: "We have seen with regret that bills have been gotten up for the relief of the old soldiers, but were always laid over for want of time to act on them; but Time waits not for the old soldier, but hurries him to his final resting-place, from whence comes no petition, no look to you for aid." I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of the sugar refiners of Philadelphia, praying for a new classification of sugars for tariff purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, protesting against any further extension of the bankrupt law, known as the fifty per cent. provision; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN. I present the memorial of T. B. Stevenson, Mary E. Foster, and several hundred other citizens of the United States, praying that the preamble to the Constitution of the United States may be amended, so as to read as follows:

We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as of supreme authority, in order to constitute a Christian government, and in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

And that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble, I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I present the memorial of John N. Farwell & Co. and ninety-nine others, leading business men and merchants of the city of Chicago, asking the Senate to take into favorable consideration the bill which has passed the House of Representatives for increasing the tariff upon imported copper and copper ores. They set forth in this petition that the amount of duty upon imported copper is much less than upon the other metals, and that this House bill ought to pass. I believe the bill is pending before the Senate, having been reported from the Committee on Finance, and I therefore move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of sugar refiners of Portland, Maine, praying for a new classification of sugar for tariff purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YATES presented the memorial of Lorenzo Sherwood, against the creation of railroad monopolies by congressional legislation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying that the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company have permission to land its submarine cable upon the shores of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition of citizens of the United States, asking aid for the establishment of a line of transatlantic steamers, and that the Postmaster General be authorized to contract with such a line for the transmission of the mails. I present with it a bill referred to in the petition, and I prefer to present it as a part of the petition. I have not examined it, and express no opinion upon its merits; but I move that, with the petition, it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1827) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1596) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of Mrs. Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of John H. Russell, praying for a patent for certain land in Arkansas, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report back the petition of John H. Rogers, praying the confirmation of title to a certain tract of land in Livingston county, Illinois, and to ask to be discharged from its consideration and have it referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Private Land Claims are of opinion that no relief can be granted as to the land. Possibly he may be entitled to recover back the purchase money if he makes out the case before the Committee on Claims. The report was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 749) to define and settle staff rank in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 750) to regulate the rank of medical staff of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 194) authorizing the transfer of certain appropriations heretofore made for the public printing, binding, and engraving; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is not an original appropriation, but it is to transfer a part of the appropriation made for the public printing from the appropriation for the purchase of paper to the appropriation for the binding and printing. I think, therefore, it had better go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain money; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations, and I should like to say to that committee that it is merely to correct a mistake. The appropriation was for the purpose of collecting mineral statistics. The Secretary of the Treasury had already employed Professor Raymond. He was engaged in the work, and the appropriation was made with reference to paying him on the work which had been done, but it is now ascertained that by inadvertence it was intrusted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he cannot get his pay. I hope the committee will give us an early report on the resolution, so that it can be passed. The chairman of the committee has no objection to its being passed at once; but he is not here, and consequently I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 751) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the judiciary of the United States," approved September 24, 1789; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

No. 754) confirming a charter granted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana for the purpose of connecting the Mississippi river with Lake Borgne by means of a canal, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 755) to define the limits of the collection district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 756) to incorporate the Great Falls Ice Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CORBETT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 757) to establish a mail route in Washington Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 758) to provide for the construction of a wagon-road for military and postal purposes through the Territories of Dakota, Montana, and Washington; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 759) to extend the patent granted to G. V. Blodgett and P. T. Sweet for oven for bakery for seven years; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 760) for the relief of Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CATTELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 761) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Delaware river between Philadelphia and Camden; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1827) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 1596) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECONSIDERATION OF A BILL.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1598) to relieve from disabilities R. W. Best and Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there be no further morning business I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 705.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 705) further to provide for giving effect to treaty stipulations between this and foreign Governments for the extradition of criminals.

The bill provides that whenever any person shall have been delivered by any foreign Government to an agent or agents of the United States for the purpose of being brought within the United States and tried for any crime of which he is duly accused, the President shall have power to take all necessary measures for the transportation and safe keeping of such accused person, and for his security against lawless violence until the final conclusion of his trial for the crimes or offenses specified in the warrant of extradition, and until his final discharge from custody or imprisonment for or on account of such crimes or offenses, and for a reasonable time thereafter. The President, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, may employ such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be necessary for the safe keeping and protection of the accused. Any person duly appointed as agent to receive in behalf of the United States the delivery by a foreign Government of any person accused of crime committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, and to convey him to the place of his trial, is to be vested with all the powers of a marshal of the United States in the several districts through which it may be necessary for him to pass with the prisoner, so far as such power is requisite for his safe keeping. If any person or persons shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose such agent in the execution of his duties, or shall rescue or attempt to rescue such prisoner, whether in the custody of the agent or of any marshal, sheriff, jailor, or other officer or person to whom his custody may have lawfully been committed, every person so knowingly and willfully offending in the premises, shall, on conviction thereof before the district or circuit court of the United States for the district in which the offense was committed, be fined not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned not exceeding one year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say to the Senator from Illinois that I have received some printed communications in regard to this measure, and also a rather lengthy written communication, which I desire to lay before the chairman of the Judiciary Committee before the bill shall be acted upon by the Senate; but I have been so occupied that I have not been able to do it thus far. If the Senator from Illinois will allow the bill to lie over until to-morrow it will afford me an opportunity of handing to him and some other gentlemen of the Committee on the Judiciary these communications, which I desire that they shall see.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and, I believe, had the unanimous assent of the committee in the form in which it is; but if the Senator from Indiana has since received any information in regard to it which he thinks might change our views I have no objection to its being further considered. Let it go over until after the committee meet. We meet the day after to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that there is any special haste, though I think it is a bill that ought to be passed substantially as it is. I am willing that it shall go over.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, it may seem presumptuous on my part to attempt to add to the arguments which have been presented either for or against this bill. I should not ask the attention of the Senate at all were I not a member of the Committee on Claims, and as such entertain fears lest a rule be adopted which may much embarrass the Government hereafter.

The amount of property used up and destroyed during the late rebellion is great almost beyond comprehension. I suppose it safe to say that ten billions, or ten thousand millions in value were destroyed in one way and another. Of this sum, $2,500,000,000 are now in the form of the national debt, and as much more, I presume, has actually been paid from the time the war commenced down to this time. That as much more as these two sums has been destroyed in one way and another, including slave property, I think there can be no question. A great deal of the damage caused by the war is of that description that there can be no compensation made for it; the injuries being utterly irreparable. I think it probable that we can draw a line of distinction between those for which compensation should be made and those in which compensation cannot be made by establishing a rule, if it is not already established, that we will pay all obligations arising out of contract, express or implied, where the contract was with loyal persons. That there may be some cases in which compensation should be made for damages to loyal persons I will not attempt to deny; but such cases, in my judgment, will be extremely rare. If we undertake to make compensation generally for damages incurred by loyal people in the South or in the North we shall find ourselves burdened utterly beyond our ability to pay.

This case of Sue Murphey I believe is something like this: our Army took possession of a portion of the rebellious State of Alabama, and were holding the part in which Decatur is situated; and while so holding that section of that State it became necessary for them to erect defensive works, forts, and fortifications, in order to prevent their being driven out again by the rebel forces; and it so happened that the military engineers regarded the real estate upon which the house claimed by Sue Murphey was located as the proper site for such a defensive work, and this work was absolutely indispensable to our forces in order that they might maintain their foothold in that State, in order that they might retain possession of Decatur. I do not understand that the damage for which compensation is now claimed comes under the head of contract in any sense of the word. I do not understand that the property taken possession of was of any absolute use to the Government, such as property is of use to the Government which is taken for quartermaster's or commissary stores; but on the other hand that it was necessary to destroy it to get it out of the way, and such was the only use made of it.

I believe none of those who have argued in favor of this claim have held that ground rent should be paid for the property that was so taken possession of. I do not understand that that is an element of the claim, but that the claim is simply for the destruction of the tenements upon the ground. A great deal of damage was done in the State of Pennsylvania by the Union Army, necessarily done, in order to repel the raid of Lee toward and at Gettysburg. This damage certainly was to persons who were friendly to the Government. Wheat fields were trampled over, fences destroyed, trees cut down, and in some cases buildings very much injured, if not absolutely destroyed; and the same is true of the whole South; and it will be claimed, if it is not true, that much of the damage which was so done was to persons who were actually friendly to the Government.

Some apprehension is expressed that we may form an unfortunate precedent by the passage of the bill now under consideration; but if this is to be regarded as a precedent in all respects, and only for such cases as are, to use a figure of my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] on all fours with this, including, if you please, the sex of the claimant, there will be, in my judgment, but little danger to be apprehended; for if Sue Murphey was a loyal southern woman she was certainly a rare exception. It would be quite safe to say that no other loyal southern woman has suffered injury of this sort. But the danger is that it will be regarded as a precedent for all classes in the South, and that many who were actually disloyal may come forward with their claims and be able, perhaps, to show some facts from which a friendly disposition toward the Government can be inferred, and thus put themselves upon as good a foundation as the claimant in this case occupies.

It is further stated, in the course of the argument, that if this class of people in the South are not to be compensated for the injuries which they have sustained there will be hereafter no inducement on the part of any portion of the inhabitants of a rebellious district to adhere to the Government; that if they are, as is stated, to be treated, in reference to the destruction of property, as rebels are treated, then hereafter they will cease to be loyal, and we must expect a united voice in any rebel district against the Government and in favor of the rebellion. But let us look a little into this argument. If it is understood that compensation is to be made for injuries so sustained what inducement is there to people in a rebel district to exert themselves to maintain the Government?

They can sit quietly by and act the part of neutrals, assured all the while that when the war is over they will be compensated for the injury they may have sustained. But if, on the other hand, the rule is established that persons are to suffer injury by reason of a rebellion, then it will devolve upon every one who is friendly toward the Government to exert himself to prevent the success of the rebellion.

It is further stated that the constitutional objection is good in this case, that private property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation. This is a rule that has but little application during wars. That it is a proper and useful and just rule during times of peace no one will attempt to question; but that it can apply in time of war is utterly beyond possibility. The rule goes to the extent of requiring compensation to be made in advance of the taking of the property; and if it is to apply in case of war the necessity would devolve upon the military commander to halt and have an appraisal made of property that he is about to take of a person, if you please, friendly to the Government before he could seize the property or destroy it. Will any one say that it would be possible to put down a rebellion, or that movements in defense of the Government could be successful, if a rule like this were to be applied? This rule was practiced by some of the early commanders of our forces; and the very fact of their paying great respect to the rights of individuals was the principal cause of the failure of some of those who were most prominent in the command of our forces during the earliest years of the war. The fact is, the public safety is the highest law, and higher than this provision of the fundamental law of the land. There is nothing above it. It is so proclaimed in all works that treat on this subject, and should be regarded as a sufficient warrant for the destruction of property, even the property of loyal persons.

If this claim is to be recognized it will do much, in my judgment, to impair the public credit. We are endeavoring in every possible way to establish the credit of the Government. There is no possibility of estimating the amount of claimants of this sort; and when once we recognize them, when once we admit the rule that where the property of loyal persons, or those who can show themselves to be loyal, has been used or destroyed its value is to be paid for out of the general Treasury, every creditor of the Government sees at once the possibility of a flood-gate of claims opened upon us, and it cannot but be disastrous to the credit of the nation.

For these reasons, Mr. President, it seems to me the claim of this person should not be recognized at this time. If it should turn out at last that this woman was no more loyal than the females of that section of the country generally, and that this property was put in her hands for the purpose of avoiding the confiscation of it, certainly in that case the tide of sympathy would settle in another direction. The desire has been to have this case decided upon its own merits, without reference particularly to the character of the person making the claim. It is regarded as a test case, and therefore of the greatest possible importance. I hope that when the vote is taken it will receive a quietus which will discourage all claimants of the sort, until at least we are better able to meet our engagements than appears in the present condition of the national credit.

Mr. FOWLER addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, the only interest that I have taken, or that I feel in this case, is that it seems to be put forward as a case in which to try all the claims of the loyal people in the insurrectionary districts. It is on that account that I have looked into the claim to see whether it is a good case in which to try the multitude of claims that will be involved in this decision coming up from the South, and I have come to the conclusion that it is a most unfortunate case.

The history of this case is brief. It is not a new one here. I remember my attention was first called to it on July 9, 1866, when the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] made a report upon it from the Committee on Claims, and that report was printed and has been read to the Senate. On the 17th of July, 1866, the bill was called up by Mr. Clark, then chairman of the Committee on Claims. It was explained and passed the Senate. (See Congressional Globe, Thirty-Ninth Congress, page 3869.) I made some feeble remarks upon it at the time, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] also spoke against it; but it passed. It went to the House of Representatives. Mr. CONKLING, then a member of the House of Representatives, on the 24th of July, 1866, moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives, which was carried. On the 14th of December, 1866, Mr. DELANO moved to postpone it indefinitely, which seems to have been carried; but still I find that on February 12, 1867, Mr. MAYNARD moved to place the bill on the Private Calendar. How that could have been done after it was indefinitely postponed I do not know; but that was agreed to. On the 15th day of February, 1867, Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, made an adverse report on the merits of the case, and his report went on the Private Calendar with the bill. That is all the record we have of the case, so far as it relates to the House of Representatives.

But it was reported again to the Senate during this, the Fortieth Congress. The previous proceedings to which I have referred were in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. There is no written report from the committee to this Congress; but we have had read the report made to the Thirty-Ninth Congress. There is no evidence submitted to the Senate either in the report or in the testimony—I have read it all—proving that this claimant was loyal prior to the capture of Decatur, in Alabama, but only after the capture; and that is proved by two officers and certified to by General Grant as being among the papers on file in the War Department. Here is a case put forward as a test case in which to try the claims of all loyal men in the South, in which not a word relating to the loyalty of the claimant can be proven until after her property was in the hands of United States officers and destroyed, and then the language is, that she uttered nothing tending to show that she was disloyal.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish my friend would allow me a word right there, if I do not interrupt him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kansas yield the floor?

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to make this additional remark first: I do not say a word disrespectful of this lady. I understand she is a lady of the highest respectability, living a blameless life.

Mr. SUMNER. I happen to have a letter in my hand to which I should like to call the attention of the Senator. His remarks now have drawn my attention to it, and with the Senator's permission I will read it. It is germane to the very point he is discussing. It is a letter addressed to me within a day or two from a gentleman who it seems has been a part purchaser of this very estate:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1868.

SIR: I happen to know something of this property of Miss Sue Murphey. Her step-father (whom no one claims to be loyal) informed me that the property was his, that it belonged to him, that he could make a title to it. I bought some of this land from him, and he has the entire control of it. I have also learned that the property only cost $1,500 a few years before the war, when its value was at its height. I have further seen it stated that Miss Murphey has made more rebel harangues in presenting rebel flags than Senator Howe has made Union speeches, and that by parties whose loyalty is above question.

I make you this statement that the matter may be fully investigated before passed upon.

Very respectfully,

D. HUMPHREYS.

Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, United States Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator know who "D. Humphreys" is? Does he vouch for him?

Mr. SUMNER. D. Humphreys, of Alabama.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to ask if the Senator from Massachusetts knows him?

Mr. SUMNER. I have seen him, but I had no acquaintance with him before. He is a gentleman of very respectable appearance, and I have no doubt of his veracity.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose it is known to every one that her step-father was a notorious rebel. Indeed, a friend in Alabama writes me that he was crazy on the subject of the rebellion, he was so persistent a rebel. But I would not visit the sins of the father or step-father upon the daughter. I am one who believes that each individual is responsible only for himself or herself. I would not prejudice the case of this claimant because her step-father or her brother-in-law, who is a son of her step-father, may have been disloyal. They are disloyal. Everybody admits it, I suppose.

But, Mr. President, what I was going to argue for the sake of calling the attention of the committee to it, and to be corrected if I am wrong, was this: there is no evidence in the papers in this case that I can find to prove any loyalty prior to the capture of Decatur and before the day that General Granger took possession of this property, at which time he says she treated them well, and from her expressions he judged her to be loyal. I will read his letter. It is addressed to "Hon. HORACE MAYNARD, Member of Congress, Washington, District of Columbia."

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF HENRICO,
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, February 21, 1868.

DEAR SIR: My friend, Miss Sue Murphey, having requested me to address to you a statement with regard to her loyalty to the United States, I cheerfully submit the following:

This is the testimony, I want to state, upon which the report is founded, because it is the strongest testimony, and almost the only testimony bearing on the question.

I made the acquaintance of Miss Murphey soon after taking command of the district of North Alabama, in June, 1864. I have known her intimately from that date to this, and as our interviews have been frequent and of the most friendly character I feel competent to judge correctly of her loyalty. I do, therefore, assert that inasmuch as I have never heard of, or known of any act of disloyalty on the part of Miss Murphey, and never heard her utter a disloyal sentiment toward the Government of the United States, I believe her loyal to that Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

H. S. GRANGER,

Brevet Brigadier General United States Army.

That, I say, is the strongest testimony in this case to prove her loyalty. There was a board authorized to sit in judgment upon the amount of this property, and they were instructed by the commanding general to report upon her loyalty and upon the value of the property, and it is a most significant fact that they never reported a word upon her loyalty, but confined themselves to the value of the property.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Kansas was upon the Committee on Claims with me, I think, at the time this bill was first reported from the committee, and he must have forgotten if he supposes that that is the strongest evidence of the loyalty of this lady.

Mr. POMEROY. I said it was the strongest evidence to be found in these papers.

Mr. ANTHONY. There were officers before us who came here at considerable personal inconvenience on purpose to testify to the loyalty of this lady, as an act of justice to her and as an act of gratitude and of recognition for the services which she rendered to them and to the soldiers under their command when they were stationed at Decatur. Now, if you are going to deny this poor girl the debt that belongs to her, I beg Senators not to take away her character also. I am not able now to recall the evidence upon which the committee came to the conclusion, but I do know, and I have no hesitation in saying, that the loyalty of this girl was proved before the committee, and in the presence of my friend from Kansas and my friend from Wisconsin, just as positively as it could be proved. There was no sort of question upon that point when we made the report.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island did not understand me as reflecting on the character of this lady. I said I understood she was a lady of the highest respectability, living a blameless life.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the Senator to say that this negative testimony was the strongest testimony in the case as to her loyalty. I think that is almost a reflection on the committee making the report, and the Senator from Kansas agreed to that report when it was made. It was as much his report as it was mine, and he heard the testimony. Would the Senator from Kansas have certified to the loyalty of any person upon such evidence as that? Officers of the United States Army were before us in person and testified to her loyalty.

Mr. POMEROY. The remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island would have some pertinency if I had been a member of the committee during the Thirty-Ninth Congress, but I was not. I was a member of the committee during the Thirty-Eighth Congress, but this claim was not before the committee during the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought the Senator was a member of the committee when we made this report.

Mr. POMEROY. I will read the finding of the board that was authorized to report upon the loyalty of the claimant, and the amount of the property destroyed. I said in the beginning that upon the first question, the loyalty of the claimant, they were silent; they did not say a word; but upon the amount of property they do say:

"We find the property destroyed, and value the loss at $7,000."

That is the report of the board authorized and commissioned to examine into her loyalty and the value of this estate.

General Granger, in another letter, says that the property was almost entirely destroyed, and yet the papers show that it was a property of one hundred acres of land adjoining the town of Decatur, on which was a building, a two-story house made of wood. There is a long description of it here in the papers. It is said that the house was destroyed; that the grounds about it were injured; the shrubberies and trees destroyed; and that the damage was $7,000. If it was an estate of one hundred acres of land adjoining the town, and there was no more valuable property than that upon it, it could not have been wholly destroyed. There must be some value left in the property. It is possible that $7,000 worth may have been destroyed; but still that estate must be worth something as one hundred acres of land, after the destruction of a two-story wooden house upon it and the shrubbery and trees around it.

I will read also the letter of General Grant on this subject, which is filed with the papers, which is a sort of presumptive evidence upon her loyalty, being entirely anxious to present that side of the case rather than the other, because if this was a case where there was no question in regard to loyalty, if this was the case of a woman who suffered the loss of all things for fidelity to the Government, who stood there during the dark hours of the rebellion, early and late, counting not her life dear unto herself, faithful to all her obligations, I tell you, sir, I would not have the heart to vote against it; but this is not a case of that kind, as shown by the papers.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas one question. Is there a particle of evidence that militates against the loyalty of this claimant? Has the Senator got a single speck of it in the papers? Has he heard a single statement to the contrary made except one that has been read this morning, written by one of the most veritable scamps in the world, as I believe I could prove here? With that exception there is not a solitary scintilla of evidence against her loyalty. Is that not sufficient evidence that she was loyal?

Mr. POMEROY. I have not undertaken to prove any disloyalty on the part of this claimant. I am only arguing that this is an unfortunate case to present as a test case, because the loyalty of the claimant is not proved. It does not devolve on me to prove her disloyalty, for I have no evidence on that subject. I have not undertaken to find evidence against the loyalty of this claimant. I only say that the papers in the case do not prove her loyalty.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to make an explanation which I deem due to the character of a man who has been denounced, I think, without proper knowledge, by the Senator from Tennessee. The letter the Senator from Massachusetts read I understood to be from a man by the name of D. Humphreys.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. I will say, as the Senator from Tennessee has used language in regard to him that I cannot very well allow to go uncontradicted, that I know Mr. Humphreys personally, and I think he is also known personally to at least one of the Senators from Ohio, and that he is a man of reputable character. The gentleman to whom I refer was formerly the editor of the Alabama Republican.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. I do not know the facts in this case, and have nothing to say about his interference in this matter of Miss Sue Murphey's claim; but I will say that the language that he is a miserable scamp does not apply to him; that for the three years I have known him, I have known him to be a man of reputable character, and of integrity, I think.

Mr. FOWLER. I will say here that I do not know the man at all; but I made my conclusion on the authority of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER,] who ought to know; and if I am wrong I wish to be corrected.

Mr. POMEROY. I know him well. Nobody knows him better than I do.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to make an explanation in reference to Mr. Humphreys. I live in the same town and know a good deal about him. He is a very meddlesome and troublesome man; so much so that the organization called the Ku-Klux in that country forced him to leave. I believe he never saw Miss Sue Murphey in his life, and does not know her. During his short residence in Decatur, Alabama, she was in the place only about three days during the whole time that he lived there, which was about eight or nine months. I believe that Miss Murphey has established fully her character for loyalty before the Committee on Claims by officers of the United States Army, who knew her and knew the services which she rendered. Of those services I cannot personally speak; but from hearsay and from the evidence adduced I have not any doubt of her loyalty at that time. Some of her family are not loyal; but I do not think she ought to be held responsible for that.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose that it is distinctly understood that I say nothing against the loyalty of Miss Murphey since the capture of Decatur. The officers of the Army who have been familiar there and lived in her house certify that she has been kind and courteous, and has never spoken a word against the Government of the United States since the capture. I admit all that. I do not doubt it. I am speaking of wanting a case, if it is to be made a test case, where loyalty is proven all the way up. Senators have all read Goldsmith's oratorio upon the captured Jews, when they were down by the rivers of Babylon, and he says:

"Oh happy, who in happy hour
To God their praise bestow,
And own His all-consuming power
Before they feel the blow."

The loyalty that I desire to commend is that which was true when the days were dark, not when they were light, before the property was captured, when the storm was raging, and not when they were safe in a calm. I understand this claimant to be a most exemplary person, who has been faithful ever since the capture, so far as I know. All I complain of is that there is no proof of her loyalty before that time. It is a most unfortunate case to present as a test on that account, because there could be no proof of disloyalty, I suppose, if any one was disposed to contest it. A lady under age (she was under age at the time) could not commit overt acts of treason. She was a non-combatant, and of course there was no positive disloyalty.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator is a lawyer. Suppose the question at issue was as to the sanity of Miss Murphey or anybody else, and it was proved that for a period dating from a certain time, of three or four or five years, the person had been sane, I ask the honorable Senator, in the absence of all other proof if that would not be satisfactory evidence that previous to that time the person had been sane? And if so in relation to sanity, why not in relation to loyalty?

Mr. POMEROY. I admit that that makes out a prima facie case of sanity.

Mr. DAVIS. And of loyalty, too.

Mr. POMEROY. And this is a prima facie case, perhaps, of loyalty; but it is to a prima facie case that I am objecting. I want a positive case of loyalty.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Where there is a case established prima facie, according to law, can that prima facie case be overruled without the production of one word or syllable of proof to impugn it?

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator does not seem to be aware that this case is not what is involved in this question. If this case had not, as I said in the beginning, been argued here as a test case; if it had not been brought forward to try the case of all the loyal people of the South, I would not have looked at it in that light; but in that view it requires evidence, not simply prima facie evidence of loyalty.

Mr. DAVIS. If my courteous friend will allow me to ask him one other question I shall trouble him no more with questions. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island has said that there came gentlemen of the Army before the Committee on Claims, who had the examination of this particular claim, and that those gentlemen of the Army who were in Decatur, and who knew Miss Murphey, had testified most fully and satisfactorily before that committee as to her loyalty; and upon that proof, in part, probably mainly, the report on the point of loyalty was made. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island has now stated that her loyalty was established and reported by the committee upon the proof of those military officers. Is not that a case where loyalty is made out by proof and reported to the Senate?

Mr. POMEROY. As I have the report of the Senator from Rhode Island in my hand, I will read what he says on that subject. I am taking up the case as I find it in the papers.

Mr. DAVIS. I am speaking of the report he makes this morning verbally.

Mr. POMEROY. If that evidence was before the committee at the time, the Senator from Rhode Island was most unfortunate in not putting it into the report.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think, if the Senator will allow me, the report states that the case of loyalty was fully made out, and we supposed that when the Committee on Claims unanimously reported that the case of loyalty was made out it was not necessary for us to give at length the verbal testimony on which we based our report. We supposed that at least we could be trusted for so much.

Mr. POMEROY. The language of the report on this question is as follows:

"The loyalty of Miss Murphey is fully sustained by the statements of officers of the Army above referred to."

Now, I will read what is "above referred to," so that the committee may have the full benefit of the report. The evidence of officers of the Army to which they refer is the report of the board that examined into the question of loyalty and the value of the property.

Mr. DAVIS. It was the officers who were examined before the committee, not those who made the report.

Mr. POMEROY. The report does not show that they did examine any officers before the committee. It will be better understood if I read the whole of it. The report reads as follows:

"In compliance with orders received from Brigadier General R. S. Granger, commanding the district of northern Alabama, Colonel Joseph Conrad, commanding the post of Decatur, ordered a board of investigation to convene for the purpose of examining and reporting in the case of the property of Miss Sue Murphey. This board convened on the 13th of February, 1865, and, after an examination as to the loyalty of the claimant and the value of the property, reported: 'We find the property destroyed and value the loss at $7,000.'"

Then the report says:

"The loyalty of Miss Murphey is fully sustained by officers of the Army above referred to."

Now, there was one officer before that board who was questioned as to her loyalty, and only one, and that was Captain Boyd, of the fifty-first Illinois infantry. I will read what he said. He was asked this question:

"What do you know relative to the loyalty of Miss Sue Murphey previous to the destruction of the property?"

It is worthy of remark that this officer was provost marshal there as early as 1862, and his testimony would be worth something as bearing on this case.

"Answer. I know that when the officers went to her house they were treated with great respect, and those surrounding her were the most bitter rebels."

That is his answer. So I say there is a sort of prima facie case, a negative case, that this lady, being a lady of such standing and character, did treat the officers of the Army well; but that does not make out a case to base this report upon, as I understand it, that she was loyal before the capture in 1864.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why, Mr. President, she was but fifteen or sixteen years old at that time.

Mr. POMEROY. She happened to be just twenty at that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. The time of the capture?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir. She is twenty-four now, I am told to-day, and that was four years ago. I do not like to bring a lady's age into any question before the Senate, but if the Senator insists upon it, to make her out under age, I am bound to tell the truth. [Laughter.]

I said I would read the testimony of General Grant. The only letter in the case that bears on the question of loyalty, in addition to what I have read, is the one from General Grant. It is addressed to Miss Murphey herself. It is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1866.

MISS SUE MURPHEY:

I have caused to be examined the papers which you filed for damages done to your property in Decatur, Alabama, by United States troops.

Loyalty is clearly proven, and the claim seems to be entirely a just one, if any such claim is allowed. It is a matter left entirely with Congress, and I can only say that if any claim for damages done by the Army in States that were in rebellion against the Government is allowed, I would respectfully recommend yours.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

I have now read all the papers in this case that appear on the files. The loyalty of this claimant is founded entirely on the report of these officers, who made their report at the War Department, and then their report was sent to the Committee on Claims. I submit that there is nothing showing her loyalty excepting what the officers have said, which I have read, as to her conduct after the capture. You cannot infer anything in regard to her loyalty or disloyalty prior to the capture. I am not disposed to make out a case that Miss Sue Murphey is a rebel; I am not pretending to argue that; I am only saying that this is a most unfortunate case to be put forward as a specimen case, on account of the fact that loyalty is not proven. It is useless to tell me that a person is loyal after the capture. I have seen a great many men who were praying for the success of the confederate arms up to the day of their capture, but when they found the cause was lost, when their hope of redress and hope for payment was only in the United States, they warmed up wonderfully and you would think that the old patriotism was rekindled; they became suddenly loyal. I will not say that this is such a case.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to set the Senator right upon one point. He has made the remark two or three times—he started out with it, I believe—that this was a case selected and put forward upon which to test all these loyal claims.

Mr. POMEROY. What I said was, that it had been treated as such by the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say to my friend that the fact that this particular case is here at all now is mere matter of accident. It is not selected for any such purpose, and was not selected at all. The case was reported upon the conditions that I mentioned the other day, reported not upon the recommendation of the committee, but reported as a mere matter of form. Another case stands upon the Calendar involving the same principle. I tried to get the consideration of the Senate for it at the last session. The Senate deliberately voted, not that they could not or would not pass it, but that they would not hear it, and it went over. That was the case, not of a woman, but of a man.

Mr. POMEROY. This is none the worse for being that of a woman.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; I do not suppose it is any the worse for being that of a woman. I simply wish to say that this case was not selected and put forward. It was taken up here, at the instance of Senators on this floor, on my motion; and I made the motion at the instance of others, and without having any opinion as to the merits of this particular claim itself. The debate started off upon the question whether, the claimant being loyal, we should pay for this property. In that debate I have taken an interest, and that interest has not abated at all, and will not until this case is settled.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator agrees with me. I only said it had been treated by the Senate as a test case. The argument, day after day, has been on the ground that it involved the principle of paying the claims of loyal men in the South. But now I am informed by the committee that they have never reported this case. If this case has not been reported and recommended by the committee, then, of course, we ought not to pass upon it as having had the adjudication of the committee. I think I must be wrong. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that the committee never reported this case; that they never authorized its report?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; the Senator, if he understands me to say so, misunderstands me. What I meant to say was, that the committee did not express an opinion on the merits of the case, but consented that it might be reported as a matter of form. I stated this to the Senate the other day, for the Senate to pass upon, because one committee of yours had already fully examined it and fully reported it, and the Senate had passed it. We were the less reluctant to report it pro forma on account of those facts.

Mr. POMEROY. Without designing to evince any hostility to this claim, for I have not any—I know nothing about the merits of the case—I merely say, from the papers before us, the Senate having taken it as a test case, it is a most unfortunate one, because loyalty has not been proven. I do not pretend to say that it is a claim which ought not to be paid. I only say that upon the case as it stands it cannot be paid, if we intend to pay only those who prove their loyalty. It is a case that cannot be paid on any such ruling as that, because the loyalty of this claimant is not proven. It is inferred; it is stated that she is loyal so far as anybody knows. Persons say they think she is loyal; but there is no positive proof, nothing that amounts to proof, nothing that is intended for proof, nothing that is addressed directly either to the committee or Congress; and it is a significant fact that the claimant in her petition does not pretend that she is loyal. She refers to the life, character, and services of her father, which, I understand, were very much distinguished and very meritorious, and as a citizen of the United States the inference is that she was also faithful to the Government, as was her father, but it is not claimed in so many words.

Mr. President, I have occupied much more time than I intended when I rose. I only intended to speak for a moment on this question. I desire simply to say in closing, expressing no opinion whether this claim ought to be paid or not, that the loyalty of the claimant is not proven. There was no evidence before the committee, and there is none before the Senate, on that point. If there was verbal testimony it is not here, and I do not know what it was. The committee say now that they did not recommend it on its merits, and the case standing in that attitude I say it cannot be voted upon intelligently by the Senate if the intention is simply to pay the claims of loyal people. If those who are anxious to pay the claims of loyal people rest their cause on this case they have a most uncertain foundation. When that cause is to be tried here, let it be tried on a case of unquestioned loyalty, on the case of one who has devoted everything—and there are plenty of them—to the Government of his country, to the cause of the Union; and then you will find a response from this Senate and from the loyal people of the country that cannot be mistaken. But if you rest your cause upon a case not proven, on a case where loyalty is only to be inferred, upon a case where the committee will not report upon the merits of it, you must expect that those who would vote for the payment of the claims of loyal people under ordinary circumstances cannot do it in this case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, such is my respect for the Committee on Claims, and especially for those members of it who advocate the passage of this claim, that I should on any ordinary occasion feel disposed to vote for anything that they proposed without even examining it; but having looked over somewhat the grounds of this particular claim, and seen, to some extent, its extraordinary reach, I must confess that I desire these gentlemen, at least, to pause long enough to allow the Government time to make its last will and testament before they pass this claim. If these gentlemen were sure to be always controlling the Committee on Claims there might, perhaps, be somewhat less of danger in the passage of this bill than there will be, taking the world as we know it is and the brevity of the service of any Senator on that hard worked committee; for if this claim should be passed we shall not see the end of this class of claims for thirty years, and I very much fear, not until the whole southern country will become debauched by this class of claims. They dot over the face of many thousand square miles of territory, and will largely depend upon the oaths of men interested in the same description of claims. We may be sure that there will be tough swearing and plenty of it before the end is reached. No section of our country ought to be subjected to so great temptations.

The test put forward is one of loyalty; that is to say, if the party whose property has been taken or destroyed is loyal then he has a lawful claim against the Government. What thin partitions divide Senators' ideas of loyalty! Would the Senators on the other side of the Chamber agree with Senators on this side as to what was loyalty? Not at all; and if that question should come up are we to take all the women in the southern country who were minors during the rebellion, and assume that they were loyal because they could not be disloyal? If property in their hands is to be made safe because they are minors, then we shall have a great many minors. Take this very case, as I understand the facts to be narrated or as I have heard them reported. The real owner of the property was a distinctly pronounced disloyalist; but when our Army approached Decatur the property was made over into the hands of this beautiful and heroic lady, according to the language of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS], in order to rescue it from confiscation.

Mr. HOWE. How did you ascertain that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is the common report here in relation to it as I have heard it repeated here again and again, and I think it may be as well founded as anything establishing her loyalty prior to the taking possession of her property. I do not understand that she inherited the property from any ancestor, but that it was so transferred just prior to the occupancy of Decatur by our troops. Mr. President, I do not propose, for one, to do anything that shall bring a stain of dishonor upon the credit of the country; but a claim not proven, presented and not allowed, is not a debt against the country; and I think that we are in duty bound to look and see how far these claims are going to reach. If they are not just and legal it will be a stain upon us to allow them to pass. Take the case of an individual who may owe honestly and fairly a debt, but when the time comes for payment he finds his children starving for bread, shall he expend his last dollar to pay his debt, or shall he pay it out for bread for his children? Our national debt is about as much as we can find the means to pay. Add to the load, and we may break down. Let us pay what we have pledged our faith to pay before we rashly assume doubtful claims the extent of which no man can calculate.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the honorable Senator from Vermont is mistaken in stating that the property was transferred to Miss Sue Murphey shortly before the Federal forces took possession of Decatur. My understanding is that this property was bought many years ago under an order of the court by the administrator, long previous to the war, for Miss Murphey and her sister.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know anything about the facts, but I have heard, at least half a dozen times, the statement made as I have related it. May I ask the Senator if the title to the property for any length of time prior to the occupation of Decatur stood in the name of Miss Sue Murphey?

Mr. SPENCER. That is my understanding. I believe it to be so, and it has been for years.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But, Mr. President, as I was saying, if a party owing an honest debt should be so circumstanced as that it would necessarily produce starvation in his family if he paid it he would be in duty bound to take care of his family first. Now, the question is, if we assume the whole burden of the claims that can be brought forward on the same basis as this claim, shall we not bankrupt the Government, and when our brethren from the South come here, as they do now, and vote for it, will they not endanger the power of the Government, in case of a subsequent rebellion, about raising the means to put it down? I think that for their own security they cannot afford to ask the Union men of the North to put down the rebellion and then to follow us with a bill of damages for doing it.

Take the case of the Shenandoah valley. There are millions of claims for property there, presenting, if not identically, the same basis as this, perhaps even stronger claims upon the Government to pay, where some of the parties were Quakers and were known to be from first to last thoroughly Union men. Take all the raids under the gallant Sheridan—are we now to pay all costs and damages? Take the case of thousands and thousands of women from the South who were sent North. At one time our Government refused to receive them, and the number who were stopping in Richmond, anxious to get across the lines, was very large. Suppose they were the owners of property seized, or that the property of rebel relatives had been placed in their hands and the title given to them; there could be no question about the loyalty of such people; it could easily be proven. Are we to refund in all these cases?

There is another class of cases. Take the case of British subjects or other aliens in any of our southern seaports, where their property has been used or destroyed by the accidents of war; if there should be a provision in any treaty now on the tapis covering claims of this character are gentlemen prepared to say that they will vote for the ratification of a treaty paying for all property so destroyed by our Army or Navy during the recent rebellion? If we pay our own citizens on the ground that they were not rebels, though in rebel territory, how can we refuse to pay aliens that were not rebels?

Take the case of loyal men whose slaves were seized before the proclamation of President Lincoln and used in our Army. Are they to be paid for the value of their slaves; and if not, why not? Senators will do well to look into the full hearings of this case.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we are to adopt the principle of paying parties who are loyal for property taken or destroyed by the Government during the war it ought to be done under some general law; that the subject should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that we should have a system—some just rule of perpetual guidance—by which all these claims shall be hereafter adjudicated; for it is quite manifest that it will be utterly out of the power of the Committee on Claims to consider even a tithe of them. This city to-day is full of millions and millions of them. Instead of there being only $30,000,000 of them, as stated by the Senator from Tennessee, I should be glad to think there were not more than $80,000,000 already lodged with claim agents and attorneys in the city at the present moment. Let the Senate decide in favor of this case, and they will make Washington the Paradise of claim agents.

But when the question comes up exclusively as to loyalty, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who addressed the Senate on Friday last, will very soon, I fear, come to the conclusion that the Constitution does not require that a man shall be loyal to be paid where his property is taken for public use, for the Constitution says nothing at all about the loyalty of the party. It reads:

"Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

There is nothing in that about loyalty, and if we tolerate any cases in States lately in rebellion of this sort we shall very soon waive anything about loyalty and admit the whole. Why, sir, we might with almost as much propriety bring forward a claim that the loyal North—which has already raised over fifteen hundred million dollars for taxes, and has had its property thus taken to that amount for public use, when the South was not taxed at all—should have that amount refunded, and then that we should levy a tax bill covering the whole country, including the South, in order to have that compensated for. I think there would be about as much justice in that claim as in the one before the Senate. When the Senator from Tennessee said, as I understood him, that if we do not pay these claims of $30,000,000 the entire South will vote to repudiate the public debt, I regretted it, as I thought we had at least evidence that there was one man from the South who might vote so any way.

But, Mr. President, I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate on this question. It seems to me a perfectly plain case, and one that ought to be rejected if we expect ever to rescue our country from its present unfortunate financial condition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had intended, Mr. President, to make a few remarks upon this bill, as the unfortunate report which has suffered so much at the hands of some of the Senators was made by me; but the subject has been so thoroughly discussed that there seems to be nothing left for me to say about it, and if there were I should surely not attempt to answer the legal arguments which have been made by the Senators who are learned in the law. My consolation in regard to them is, that whereas it has been proved conclusively and absolutely and unmistakably on one side that the payment of this claim violates all the principles of constitutional and statute law, it is shown upon the other side that a refusal to pay it will be an equal violation of constitutional and statute law; and I suppose, when the learned doctors differ, that plain men may take the plain significance of the question.

If the Constitution is to be read according to its plain understanding I am unable to see how this case evades the provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. When you can prove to me that this property taken for the construction of a public building by the United States, is not to be paid for, then you will satisfy me that any other debt that the United States owes is not to be paid. This is not property that was destroyed by an army on its march; it is not property that was destroyed to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy and affording him aid and comfort; it is not property that would have been destroyed by one army if it was not by the other; but it is a certain amount of property that the United States took by competent authority and by public necessity for the construction of a public work, and we are just as much bound to pay for those materials, for the stone and the wood that were used in the construction of that fort, as we are to pay for the cannon that was mounted upon it or the ammunition with which the cannon was served; just as much as we are bound to pay for the supplies and the clothing that were furnished to the garrison in that fort.

This case was presented to the Senate two or three years ago. It was examined before the Committee on Claims. It was reported, I think, unanimously. The evidence of the loyalty of this lady was presented before us to the satisfaction of every member of the committee. I am not able now to recall the evidence, but I recollect that military officers appeared before the committee, came on here voluntarily to testify upon that point, and the committee were perfectly satisfied upon that point, and so reported, but did not report all the verbal evidence upon which they relied. The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims. It passed the Senate. It went to the House of Representatives. In the House of Representatives they had a rule which prevented the consideration of bills of this kind. The case was so strong upon its merits that the rule was suspended in its favor, and the bill would undoubtedly have passed but for want of time. It fell for want of time.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must have forgotten that the Committee of Claims in the House of Representatives made an adverse report upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know they made an adverse report, but that was reconsidered.

Mr. POMEROY. I find no evidence of that.

Mr. ANTHONY. The adverse report was made on the ground that the rule of the House did not allow the consideration of such claims at all, and that rule was suspended. That is my recollection. If the Senator is more correctly informed, I may be mistaken.

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot find it in the Globe. I looked into the Globe on that question.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, it passed the Senate, anyhow. There is no doubt about that. It has passed this body once; and now, that Congress having expired, the claimant comes before this Congress and presents her petition again, and she is told that somehow or other, she does not know how, she is a rebel. I believe the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] proved it out of Vattel, and I think one of the Senators threw Puffendorf at the poor girl's head; and I do not know but that somebody is preparing a dose of Grotius for her. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, I believe that not Vattel, Puffendorf, nor Grotius, nor the Senate and House of Representatives, nor the Army and Navy, nor Powers and principalities, nor things present, nor things to come can make any man or woman an unwilling rebel. I do not believe that any national law can make the Senator from Kansas or myself a rebel wherever we may live. And now if we are going to refuse to pay this claimant the debt which was incurred by the authority of the United States, by competent authority, for a legal purpose, and a necessary purpose, at least let us spare her character. She is a daughter of a United States officer.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator does not think that I tried to make her out a rebel. I tried to speak of her in the highest terms.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the Senator helped her much.

Mr. POMEROY. I am informed from all sources that she is a lady of the highest respectability. I never intended to reflect at all upon her. What I contend is that you have not proved her loyalty.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, sir, her loyalty was proved before the Committee on Claims to their unanimous satisfaction. Whatever differences the Committee on Claims might have had, if they had any, (and I do not think they had, although my friend from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] urging me to make this report all the time, I believe now professes to be on the other side;) nobody questioned her loyalty. I think my friend from Oregon will agree that the loyalty of this lady was made out to the entire satisfaction of the committee; and now I ask Senators at least to spare that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to controvert what the honorable Senator says, but I think my record will show from beginning to end that I have opposed all these claims. I spoke and voted against the Ames claim. I spoke against a claim of a similar nature here, originating in Virginia, at the last session. I have been opposed to this principle, and controverted it in the Committee on Claims whenever it came up in that committee. It is true I had these papers in my hands, and I must confess I felt very reluctant to report against Miss Murphey, and I did request the honorable Senator to take the papers out of my hands, knowing what his views and feelings were upon the question, and he consented to do it. But I hope the honorable Senator will not say that I ever spoke or voted in favor of paying this claim.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir; I do not say so; but I appeal to the Senator from Oregon if the loyalty of this lady was not perfectly made out before the committee? Was there any question of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make no question of the lady's loyalty, and never have made any. Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate with very great interest, and, I confess, with a sense of high responsibility; not because the case itself involves very much, but because the principle which may be established by the passage of this bill may involve a large amount of money. It is not my purpose to discuss the questions involved at length. I rise rather to state the conclusions to which my mind has arrived during the discussion. When it began, I confess that in consideration of the amount which might follow the establishment of claims of this kind in the southern States, I was disposed to shrink from it; indeed the prejudice of my mind, if I had any, was against the consideration of the claim. I wished it were not here; I wished it had not come up. But, sir, the discussion has been had; the case is here, and I must state frankly the conclusions to which my mind has arrived.

I believe that the true rule governing cases of this kind is well stated by Vattel, and that no authority which has been produced here and no consideration or argument introduced here changes at all the effect of the rule he lays down: it is in answer to the question "whether a State is bound to indemnify individuals for the damages they have sustained in war." He says:

"The damages under consideration are to be distinguished into two kinds: those done by the State, and those done by the enemy. Of the first kind—"

That is, of those done by the State itself—

"some are done deliberately and by way of precaution; as, when a field, a house, a garden belonging to a private person is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town, rampart, or any other piece of fortification. Such damages are to be made good to the individual who should bear only his quota of the loss. But there are other damages caused by inevitable necessity; as, for instance, destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from an enemy. Those are merely accidents; they are misfortunes, which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they happen to fall. For the sovereign indeed ought to show an equitable regard for the sufferers if the situation of his affairs will admit of it; but no action lies against the State for misfortunes of this nature, for losses which she has occasioned, not willfully, but through necessity, by mere accident in the exertion of her rights. The same may be said of damages caused by the enemy. All States are exposed to such damages, and woe to him on whom they fall."

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention, as he is on that point, to what I would call the marginal note of it, which he will find in the table of contents under the head, book four, chapter fifteen, as follows:

"Whether the State is bound to indemnify the subjects for damages sustained in war."

Showing that this clause is applicable to the case of damage to a subject and not of damage to an enemy.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I am aware of that distinction, and I shall come to that question and state my opinion upon that. I first speak of the two kinds of damages: first, those done deliberately by the Government as a matter of precaution, the result of will and judgment in advance of any actual conflict; and next, those other damages which are caused in the midst of the conflict, in the collision of arms, in the capture and recapture of places, in the destruction which follows directly and of necessity from the war itself. This distinction Vattel takes, and it seems to me to be a wise distinction founded in the very nature of things. For the accidents of war, for the destruction which may be occasioned by the march of armies, by battles, by the capture of towns, by the resistance of an enemy when you are endeavoring to capture a town, no nation in the world could be called upon justly to pay. They are the acts of a power which the state does not and cannot control, and are likened in the law to the acts of God. They are like fire, like conflagration, like flood, like earthquakes. On whomsoever these damages fall, whether loyal or disloyal, the person who owns the property must submit to his misfortune and must suffer the loss.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope my honorable friend will wait a few minutes. I wish to state my conclusions, and when I am through I will hear any question.

Mr. CORBETT. Just one point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It interrupts the line of argument, if one has a connected train of thought, to be questioned upon every point as he passes. I am stating rather the principle of law which I think controls this case. I wish to go on and state the distinction between this case and the case of Armes, in Virginia. Armes in Virginia was in possession of a house. The rebels from time to time entered this house, and it was made the cover of rebels when they were firing on our pickets. In fact it was used, not as a fortification exactly, but a kind of cover for the enemy, and our forces destroyed the house to destroy this cover of the enemy; and the question came up whether Armes should be paid. I resisted the appropriation; I resisted the bill that appropriated anything for the payment of Armes's claim, because I insisted that the destruction of Armes's house was one of the accidents of war necessary to uncover the enemy or to drive them away. It was the same as if it had been destroyed in battle, and therefore I could not vote for the payment of it.

But this case of Murphey stands upon another and an entirely different ground. First of all, after this place, Decatur, has come into the control of our Army this house is required to be delivered up for the purpose of precaution, deliberately, in order to erect a fortification upon it; and the house is taken down, the materials used are put into this fortification, and an appropriation of the property is made for that purpose deliberately, before hand, by precaution, by a direct act of the will of the commander there in possession; and such was an absolute appropriation of the property for the time being by our commander, and it is a different thing from the case of Armes, as I understand.

I know it has been said—my honorable friend from Massachusetts says she was not a subject, she was an enemy. That is a very important statement if it is true. If the facts in the case prove that she was disloyal, that she was in fact an enemy, aiding and abetting the rebellion against the United States, it would change her relations toward the Government, in my opinion, altogether. I know the honorable Senator has read a letter here which comes in at the last end of the debate, from a gentleman by the name of Humphreys, who raises a question upon her loyalty, throwing out a loose expression like this, (which in my judgment does not entitle the letter to very great weight,) he says that Miss Murphey made as many rebel speeches as Senator Howe has made Union speeches. Now, this letter comes here, never having gone to the committee; it comes here solely, and containing expressions of this kind, I confess to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that it produces no impression on my mind as against the report of the committee, especially when the report of the committee is explained by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island. The report of the committee says: "The loyalty of Miss Murphey is fully sustained by the statements of officers of the Army above referred to, and others who were at Decatur during the war." And the honorable Senator from Rhode Island states the fact that these officers appeared in person before the committee, came at considerable expense and sacrifice, for the purpose of testifying before the committee to the loyalty of this woman; and upon this testimony, our committee having reported the fact that she was a loyal person, I act upon the report of the committee, and not upon loose statements contained in this letter of Humphreys.

Mr. President, I assume, then, that we may safely stand upon the report of the committee that she was a loyal person to the Government of the United States, and being so this Government treats her not as an enemy, but as a friend. I know, Mr. President, that something has been said in the course of the discussion about the act of Congress authorizing the President to declare certain States or parts of States in insurrection, and that the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln in pursuance of that authority did actually put those States in a state of insurrection, so that from the moment they were declared to be in insurrection all the people of that territory, without distinction, were to be treated as enemies of the United States, and therefore whenever we touched any portion of their property, real or personal, it is to be regarded as enemy's property, not the property of citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, in my opinion that is not giving the true construction either to the act of Congress or to the proclamation of the President, for I call your especial attention to the language of the proclamation of President Lincoln, in which he says:

"In pursuance of an act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, I do hereby declare the inhabitants of the said States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida except—"

I call especial attention to the exceptions—

"except the inhabitants of that part of the State of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany mountains, and of such other parts of that State and the other States hereinbefore named as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of the insurgents."

So that the very proclamation of insurrection excepts the loyal parts of States which maintained their adhesion to the Government, and not only were then maintaining it, but such parts of States as from time to time should be placed in possession and control of the forces of the United States. Then this place, Decatur, having been taken possession of by General Sherman, whatever effect you may give to the act of Congress and the proclamation of President Lincoln, from the moment the flag was planted there under the control of our forces, Decatur was a part of the territory of the United States of America; its flag was sovereign, and the Constitution was supreme.

I have never yet admitted that the hour existed when the Constitution of the United States was not supreme in right over every foot of soil from the Potomac to the Rio Grande. I know other distinguished gentlemen have differed with me, and have maintained that wherever we were excluded by military force there our jurisdiction had ceased, and the rights of the people of that territory under the Constitution had ceased, and the States which had come within the lines of the rebellion ceased to have their rights under the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, by the very terms of the proclamation all the portions of the States which were subjected to our arms were not any longer in insurrection, and, therefore, whatever view gentlemen may have taken on that subject—and I shall not enter into the discussion of that question, for it is a very grave one which I have often discussed on the floor of the Senate, and on which I know that the majority have decided against me—according to the proclamation made by President Lincoln, this town of Decatur, from the time that General Sherman occupied it with his forces, was excepted from the declaration of insurrection, and the Constitution of the United States became supreme, not only in fact but in right, and the people of Decatur had their rights under that Constitution.

Mr. President, I know that the decisions of the Supreme Court have been referred to in the prize cases arising on questions of blockade. Those questions, so far as they were decided by the Supreme Court, only refer to the character of the property which was captured. They decided that property which was captured under the blockade was enemy property, irrespective of the owner of it. Why, Mr. President, you might have been the owner of the property which was captured, and yet under the decision of the Supreme Court the property itself, from the manner in which it was captured under the blockade, be decided, and properly decided, to be enemy property, and therefore liable to seizure. But the Supreme Court never decided that the people residing within certain territorial limits became enemies of the United States unless they engaged actually in rebellion against the United States.

Mr. President, I shall not, as I stated in the beginning, go into a discussion of this question at length. I am satisfied that my duty calls upon me, as this measure is before the Senate, to vote in favor of the payment of this claim; and it is not paying for the one hundred acres of land, but for the damages which were done in the destruction of the house and the buildings and outbuildings around it, which was appraised properly, as it seems to me, by the commanding officer or under his direction, and ascertained at the time. And there is another fact not to be forgotten, the fact stated by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that in two cases, precisely similar, in the neighborhood of Nashville the Government of the United States did pay for houses that were taken and torn down for the purpose of building fortifications—in one case, I think, $29,000, and in the other case some thirty-eight thousand dollars.

I think that although it may in the end involve the expenditure of millions of dollars, perhaps twenty millions, perhaps thirty million dollars, where a case is made out like this of a clean appropriation of property by the authorities of the Government, made with deliberation, in advance, of the property of loyal citizens, not destroyed by the accidents of war, not destroyed in the strife of battle, not destroyed in capturing or recapturing a town, but absolutely appropriated beforehand, it is our duty, as the representatives of this Government, to pay for it; and I think we shall not injure our credit by doing it; nor do I think we shall establish a precedent which in all time to come will be injurious to this Government, for it does seem to me the most dangerous precedent we can establish would be to say to the people of the States, in all sections of the United States, "hereafter whenever an insurrection shall arise we shall never know any distinction between our friends and our enemies." It would be a most dangerous precedent, in my judgment, for this Government to establish.

Mr. CORBETT. I will now ask the gentleman from Wisconsin the question I desired to ask him when I interrupted him. It is whether the rule he lays down of a deliberate action applies to the emancipation proclamation of the President, whereby he freed all the slaves of that section of the country? Does the gentleman consider that a deliberate action?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is not necessary to answer a question which cannot arise; for as the majority have accepted the fourteenth amendment, as I understand, as a part of the Constitution, it places that subject beyond the reach of Congress altogether.

Mr. CORBETT. There is another question that may be involved in regard to the constitutional amendment. The question is whether such claims as this are not a portion of the confederate claims that may be considered as contracted within the confederate States, as they were confederated together in the South? This claim was contracted there; the property was taken during the time that Alabama was confederated with the other States. Hence the question is whether we shall examine any of these claims that were contracted in those States during the confederation?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The Senator from Wisconsin is a lawyer; I wish to put to him one question. He stated in the first part of his remarks that property destroyed during the course of a battle, as a house, for instance, should not be paid for, and that the owner cannot come in and ask damages for the loss of his house. I take it, therefore, if in the course of a battle it was found necessary to tear down a house to throw up an intrenchment to hold part of the field taken, the owner could not come in and claim damages. Now this is the case: Decatur had been taken, and our forces found it necessary to take Miss Murphey's house in order to put up defenses to hold it. I want to know how that case differs in principle from the one in which the Senator admits damages could not be claimed. I wish he would answer as a lawyer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it grows out of the distinction which is stated in the authority I read from, Vattel. It is done deliberately, beforehand, by way of precaution, when no battle is raging, and it becomes a deliberate appropriation of property; but when a battle is raging, what may be done in the movement of troops is a thing of accident dependent upon the moment; and the destruction of property, then, the Government is no more responsible for than it would be for the overflowing of a flood that, while it is flowing, overturns this house or overturns that. That is my view.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The battle was not raging but it was imminent. The country had not been secured against the necessity for the employment of military force to protect it. And was it not just as necessary to throw up this defense to protect Decatur, as to keep a military force there to do it? Now, if the Senator can justify the destruction of property to hold a position during the progress of a battle, the principle is precisely the same which applies to this case.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to recommit this bill, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Claims. I do it on the ground that the committee as now constituted have not recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I shall object to the recommitment of the bill at the present time. I desired, before this debate closed, to submit some remarks upon the bill, and especially in reply to the observations that have been submitted by other Senators.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator desires to address the Senate, and will move to recommit the bill after he has completed his remarks, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The motion to recommit does not cut off debate.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that I might submit my own remarks upon this motion, but I do not design to trespass upon the attention of the Senate again until other Senators who desire to oppose the principle involved in this bill have occupied such time as they choose to occupy. I thought perhaps it was my right—I do not know that it is—to close the debate, and had intended to do so. If there are no other Senators who wish to address the Senate upon this question I am as willing to submit what I have to say at the present time as at any other.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the Senator desire an adjournment?

Mr. HOWE. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. POMEROY. The motion is debatable, and the Senator can make his remarks on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HOWE. You had better withdraw it, and then we shall ascertain whether anybody else wants to speak.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am gratified that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims desires to complete this discussion. I think that under the usages and courtesies of the Senate it is due to him; and I am fully willing, so far as I am concerned, to accord him that position in the debate; but previous to his concluding the argument I ask leave to make a few other suggestions.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the Senator desire to go on now or would he prefer speaking tomorrow? With the consent of the Senator I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time the doors were reopened; and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. H. L. GATES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, asking the favorable attention of Congress to the claim of Mrs. H. L. Gates, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General William Gates, an officer of the Army for sixty-two years, for a difference of pay due said officer; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DR. SETH W. LANGDON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant General of the Army upon the claim of Dr. Seth W. Langdon, of Vermont, for medical services rendered the United States at the draft rendezvous at New Haven, Connecticut, in response to a request of the Committee on Military Affairs; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with the act of February 22, 1867, transmitting the report of Brevet Major General L. Thomas on the national cemeteries of the United States, with remarks thereon by the Quartermaster General of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting a report by Gardiner G. Hubbard, of Boston, with draft of bill and other papers, relative to the establishment of a cheap system of postal telegraph; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

JONES VS. MANN—ELECTION CONTEST.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House additional testimony in the contested-election case of Simon Jones vs. James Mann, of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence for three days was granted to Mr. BOWEN.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired, and the House resumes the consideration of the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will my colleague yield to me to offer a resolution?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. After the consular bill shall have been disposed of, I propose to go into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill. Before doing so, however, I will yield to gentlemen to get in some business they desire to introduce.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I want to introduce a resolution for a committee of investigation on some post office matters that have already been referred to in debate here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I yield at all for such a purpose it will be to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The consular appropriation bill is the regular order, it having been the special order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee of the Whole, when considering the consular appropriation bill, struck out two or three sections upon points of order raised by gentlemen. I believe every gentleman in the House concedes that the sections were right; but as they were not strictly in order under the rules, they were excluded upon points of order. I therefore propose to offer as a substitute for the bill as reported from the Committee of the Whole, an amended bill, which shall embrace those sections which were excluded upon points of order. That substitute, which I hold in my hand, is the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with some formal changes in reference to consulates which by mistake had been put in the wrong schedule, and a consulate which had been omitted by mistake. There was an informal vote making a new consulate at Valencia, Spain; but the gentleman who moved that amendment is now satisfied that it may be properly left out. I therefore offer the substitute I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent, as it contains some matter not in order under the rules.

Mr. JENCKES. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move that the rules be suspended, in order that I may be allowed to offer the substitute I have indicated.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to inquire whether the bill which it is proposed to adopt as a substitute does not contain three or four sections which have been ruled out of order?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is what I have stated.

Mr. SCHENCK. The object is, then, to suspend the rules to get in that which is out of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The object of suspending the rules is, as a matter of course, to make the substitute in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] does not in his substitute strike out any of the amendments which were adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. None that were adopted, with the exception of that in regard to a consulate at Valencia. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELSEY,] my colleague on the committee, who offered that amendment, came to the conclusion after hearing an explanation that a consulate ought not to be established at that place.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the substitute been printed?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The substitute is the bill as originally reported, with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] in relation to the collection of fees on vessels in Canada.

Mr. MUNGEN. I call for the reading of the substitute.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute, which is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

Mr. MUNGEN, (before the reading of the substitute was concluded.) I withdraw my demand for the reading of the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of adopting the substitute for the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole, so that the question may be taken on the passage of this substitute, instead of the bill reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to make an inquiry. I wish to know whether the proposition is to suspend the rules that this substitute may be offered and at the same time adopted, so that by one vote we suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand the motion. It is to suspend the rules to adopt a substitute for the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole, so that the question may afterward be taken on the passage of this substitute.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then the amount of the matter is this: not liking the action of the House, not liking the disposition made of amendments which were rejected as not being in order, the gentleman from Illinois offers a new bill embodying what was originally presented by the committee, and proposes by one vote to get it through the House without reading as a substitute for the bill passed in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The points of order having been reserved in the House upon this bill, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled out the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the printed bill, as out of order under the one hundred and twentieth rule. Those sections, therefore, are not in the bill as reported from the Committee of the Whole. The object of this motion to suspend the rules is to reincorporate those sections in the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. So I understand—to put through the original bill in this indirect way.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The only objection of my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to the sections stricken out in the Committee of the Whole was that they were not in order under the rules. I now move to suspend the rules, to obviate that objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman has not quite understood me. I think there is good matter in these sections, but that they have nothing whatever to do with a report from the Committee on Appropriations; and if we abandon our rules and allow general legislation—

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then, I inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not possible to make objection to that portion of the substitute which is out of order?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion to suspend the rules is for the purpose of obviating that very objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. For the purpose of getting in those sections out of order.

On the motion to suspend the rules there were—ayes 59, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and SCHENCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 28.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof)

the rules were suspended, and the bill was taken up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the naval appropriation bill; and pending that motion I yield, according to promise, to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA.]

Mr. POMEROY. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I withdraw the motion.

WELLS, FARGO AND COMPANY.

Mr. ELA. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed to investigate all matters connected with the contracts of Wells, Fargo & Co. for carrying the overland mails, and also the manner in which the mail service has been performed, and whether any mail service has been increased which was not warranted, and if so to what extent; and whether any money has been paid to contractors without certificate of service performed, and if so to whom and by whose order and to what extent; with power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, and report at any time.

And be it further resolved, That the proper officers of the Treasury Department be requested to make no payment to said Wells, Fargo & Co. on their said contract till the matters connected therewith shall be fully investigated.

Mr. POMEROY. Allow me one moment. To part of the resolution there is no objection; that is, so far as the investigation is concerned. But as regards stopping the payment of moneys under the Government contract, it would be very extraordinary, it seems to me, to order it to be done without any discussion of the merits of the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is no contract which has been performed.

Mr. POMEROY. There has been a contract performed, and more service performed than the moneys due to-day will cover. The company is at a loss to-day for the Government moneys due under the contract, as can be shown to the satisfaction of this House in a debate on the subject. So far as the investigation of the contract is concerned, I wish to have it done; but I do not want, under cover of that proposition, to deprive the company of moneys legally earned and at a loss to them in doing this very service. If the resolution may be divided I have no objection to interpose.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be divided under the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the House will adopt the resolution and suspend the payment. It will take only thirty days, any how.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire myself to have the contract investigated, though I see there has been some innuendoes sent out that I oppose the investigation. I tried to get the floor this morning for the purpose of offering a resolution for the appointment of a special committee, intending to say that I did not wish to be appointed on that committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire move to suspend the rules simply to introduce the resolution, or for the purpose of agreeing to it as well?

Mr. ELA. For the purpose of agreeing to it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask if any member or Delegate interested in this mail service desires this to be done? So far as I know there is none.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELA. I will modify the resolution by striking out the last clause, "till the matters connected herewith shall be fully investigated," and substituting therefor the words "during the next thirty days."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 55, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Buckland, Burr, Roderick B. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Culom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Ela, Fields, French, Getz, Goss, Gravely, Halscy, Hawkins, Heaton, Chester D. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Wood—78.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BOUTWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to give way to me to offer a resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate this matter, without the other part of the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What will be the use of investigating when the money is taken?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is not investigation the gentleman wants; that is the trouble. It is investigation we want. We want facts. My colleague does not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand what kind of an investigation my colleague wants.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I want facts, not hearsay; I want affidavits, not innuendoes.

SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I must decline to yield. I desire for a moment to get the attention of the House to a report from the Judiciary Committee of a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and also a bill as a substitute for House bill 1463, which was referred to the committee, entitled "An act to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States," &c., relating to the subject of suffrage. I wish to have them accepted this morning, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee, on which motion I propose to enter a motion to reconsider, with the understanding that the motion to reconsider will not be taken up under a week or ten days. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], who is a member of the Judiciary Committee, and represents the minority of the House, is content with this arrangement. I do not know whether he is now in his seat or not; but it is satisfactory to him, and I hope will be to all the members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to suspend the rules. I think the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his objection if he understands that our purpose is not to take up these matters under a week or ten days, and we then propose to give reasonable opportunity for debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire, in the first place, to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if this business is to go outside the morning hour?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall object unless it is confined to the morning hour.

Mr. ELIOT. I hope the morning hour will be kept for reports of committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is a report from a committee.

Mr. ELIOT. It ought not to come up out of its order. We shall not be able to go through the call of committees this session, and I hope the House will insist upon it that the morning hour shall be preserved for that business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that without the morning hour shall be preserved the committees, in all probability, cannot be called through this session.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think there will be sufficient time for the consideration of this matter outside of the morning hour.

Mr. ELIOT. Very well; let that be the understanding before we vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that, because we need all the time outside of the morning hour for the consideration of public business, the appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] if it is to take the morning hour. I think his measures are as legitimately public business as appropriation bills or any other bills.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I make the motion to suspend the rules, with the understanding that I shall call up the motion to reconsider outside of the morning hour, having due regard to the condition of the public business, as I have no desire to interfere with the appropriation bills. There certainly will be time outside of the morning hour between now and the 4th of March next to consider the measures to which I refer.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] it is to suspend the rules to enable him to report the joint resolution and bill to which he has referred, to have them printed and recommitted, and to enable him to enter a motion to reconsider the recommitment, which motion to reconsider shall not be laid on the table.

Mr. BECK. After an explanation made to me by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] I withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

No further objection was made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now report from the Committee on the Judiciary joint resolution (H. R. No. 363) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and a bill (H. R. No. 1463) declaring who may vote for electors for President and Vice President and for Representatives in Congress, with substitutes for the same, which I move be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that it would probably simplify the action of the House to have the substitutes reported as original measures.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I accept the suggestion of the Chair, and report from the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution to which I have referred.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read a first and second time.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask that the joint resolution be read in full.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring), that the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be held as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE—

SEC. 1. The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by proper legislation the provisions of this article.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the joint resolution be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1667) declaring who may vote for electors for President and Vice President and for Representatives in Congress; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal.

SLAVERY IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of introducing and agreeing to the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Cottin, of the United States Army, a sub-assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for the State of Kentucky, in his report for November last, makes the following statement: "It may seem strange to many that in parts of Kentucky slavery exists as unquestionably as before the proclamation of the amendment to the Constitution abolishing it. In the counties of Owen, Trimble, and Carroll, and several other counties of my district, negroes are kept in a state of vassalage tantamount to the old system of slavery. In those counties negroes are not permitted to live in homes or houses of their own; are not permitted to live apart from the white owners of the soil, but are compelled to leave the country or occupy the out-houses or sheds, as in days of slavery;" and whereas many of these persons are children ignorant of their rights and unable to defend them, and many others are too poor to employ counsel and meet the expenses of litigating their rights in the Federal courts, and hundreds of miles distant: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment, by competent authority, of United States commissioners, in convenient and suitable localities, with power to issue writs of habeas corpus, to hear and determine applications and causes involving such illegal slaveholding, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I have the honor to represent two of the counties named in the preamble of this resolution, and I believe the statement therein named is entirely false, and that the proposed action is totally unnecessary.

Mr. JULIAN. I give official authority for the statement in the preamble.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I object to debate.

The motion to suspend the rules was then agreed to, there being upon a division—ayes 81, noes 22, (two thirds voting in the affirmative,) and the preamble and resolution introduced and agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Before making my motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I will yield in the first place to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to my colleague yielding.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There are several gentlemen who desire to introduce matters by unanimous consent. I do not wish to press my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill until those gentlemen shall have had an opportunity to introduce their several propositions.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to my colleague holding the floor and farming it out. He must either surrender the floor or go on with his business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I surrender the floor to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot, with proper respect for the Chair, surrender the floor on condition that the Chair shall award it to a particular gentleman. If he surrenders the floor it reverts, under the custom of the House, to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I will not surrender the floor. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. PIKE. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is willing that his colleague shall yield to me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am willing to give way as soon as I can offer a resolution.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I wish to inquire what bill comes up if we go into Committee of the Whole? I understand it is the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The naval appropriation bill has priority as a special order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to modify my motion so as to rescind the order of the House making the naval bill a special order, my object being to allow an hour or two of general debate on any subject. It can be done by unanimous consent, I presume.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, then, to reconsider the vote by which the House made the naval bill a special order.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. So far as I am concerned I did not desire any extended general debate; but several other gentlemen wished to make speeches. I move that when the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the special order all general debate on the bill be closed in thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 1599, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1870.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

The Clerk concluded the first reading of the bill.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the following item:

Navy-yard at New York:
For repairs of all kinds, $100,000.

I wish to inquire whether this amount is in accordance with the estimate of the Department, or merely the gentleman's own estimate?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Appropriations upon the estimate of the Department. It is not as large as the amount asked for by the Navy Department, but it is a sufficient sum for all the repairs at this navy-yard that the Committee on Appropriations deem necessary.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether he has any objection to mention the amount of the estimate by the Navy Department? There is a good deal of important work going on at the New York navy-yard. It is a question not only of local importance, but a question of national importance; and I think that the House should understand the reason for this proposed reduction, in view of the statements and estimates of the Navy Department itself. I should like to hear the amount originally proposed by the Navy Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The estimate of the Navy Department is $250,000. The amount which the Committee on Appropriations has reported, as the gentleman from New York has suggested, is $100,000. Last year, I think, the Navy Department modestly asked that we should appropriate about four million dollars at New York, and in the Navy appropriation bill we only appropriated $140,000. They have got along well with that, remarkably well, and I believe they can get along very well with this appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. CHANLER. I have no doubt the gentleman is of the opinion that we can get along without anything appropriated for the Navy. Perhaps he does not think that a Navy is necessary at all. Living in Illinois, he may think that we can get along without a Navy until a foreign invading foe has reached Illinois. But, sir, this House knows that it is absolutely necessary for the protection of our commerce that our navy-yards should be kept up in a proper condition of efficiency. I do not see, therefore, why the opinions of an experimental philosopher of the caliber of the gentleman from Illinois should be set up in defiance to the opinions of the Navy Department, which is responsible for carrying on the work of the navy-yards of the country and seeing that they are properly and efficiently kept up. Yet the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has assumed the responsibility of reducing this appropriation. That the Navy Department last year asked for an appropriation which it did not get, and which it has not again asked for, is no evidence that it was not really needed, or that the amount estimated for this year is not necessary for the purposes specified by the Department. I trust that the estimates of the Navy Department will be kept, in this instance, without reduction.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, as a compromise between the appropriation here proposed and the estimate of the Navy Department, I move that the appropriation for repairs of all kinds at the navy-yard at New York be increased to $150,000. As I understand the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Navy Department estimates $250,000 as absolutely necessary for the repairs to be made at this Brooklyn navy yard. I hope that the amendment appropriating $150,000 will be adopted.

Mr. PIKE. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. There are two courses that this House can pursue in this matter of navy-yards: one is to let them run down, upon the ground that there is no necessity even for a navy of any kind, and that is the spirit which seems to actuate the appropriations reported in this bill. If, therefore, the House shall conclude to take that course, then it is hardly worth while to change the bill in so small an amount, as from $100,000 to $150,000, in reference to this great navy-yard at Brooklyn.

That is a navy-yard which by its location and its capabilities can be made the great navy-yard of the country; and, sir, it should be made the first navy-yard of the country if we are to have a great navy-yard at all. Fifty thousand dollars more or less, therefore, is not of the slightest consequence.

As the gentleman from Illinois has said, the Navy Department recommended a liberal sum for the purpose of having a navy-yard worthy of a great naval Power. We also have one at Philadelphia, where, after a long contest, we have fixed on League Island as the proper place to which to transfer the Philadelphia navy-yard, and build up a navy-yard worthy of the United States. It seems to me to be good economy on the part of the Government to make a liberal expenditure of the public money both at Brooklyn and League Island. The Committee on Appropriations, however, think otherwise. That committee is opposed to making the appropriations which the Navy Department deems necessary. It may be right that it is not worth our while under the present circumstances to make an appropriation for this purpose. If the committee take this ground then I hope it will go further, and make no appropriation for the Army; for certainly, sir, if we have no need of a navy there is less need of our having an army. It seems to me that it would be absurd that we, as a naval Power, which we profess to be, should cut down our Navy and still maintain a large standing army, when our Navy maintains our power all over the world, while our standing Army is simply for the purpose of regulating our internal concerns. If we are to cut down one, then, in order to carry out the doctrine symbolized by the expression of "let us have peace," let us have neither Army nor Navy. On this assumption, therefore, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] will not prevail; for if we are to make no future provision for the Navy of the United States we should, for the same reason, make no provision for the future for the Army of the United States.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let me call the attention of gentlemen to some items in the published estimates which, I confess, I do not fully understand. On page 121 the Secretary of the Navy reports that there is a balance of appropriation standing to the credit of the navy-yard at New York of $816,561 20. On page 260 the estimate for the same navy-yard for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, which is the next fiscal year, is $251,305. It does not appear how this balance of nearly a million dollars is to be disposed of.

Mr. PIKE. That will lapse back into the Treasury at the expiration of the present fiscal year, under the action taken by Congress in the last Navy appropriation bill. The Secretary of the Navy has made his estimates in accordance with the view of the House at the last session, that there shall be no further balances of appropriations after the expiration of a fiscal year standing to the credit of the Navy Department.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs on this question of experimental philosophy, so far as the Navy of the United States is concerned. I am sorry, however, that he has become so affected with the spirit of despair that while he believes our Navy needs certain sums of money to carry it on he still allows the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to capture all our navy-yards without anything like a fight in their behalf. He seems to give up the question, and to take the ground that if he cannot get all the money which may be needed he will take none.

Now, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says that notwithstanding the Navy Department, which by law is authorized to take cognizance of all matters relating to our Navy, has declared that certain sums of money are necessary to carry it on, the Navy can do without them. He proposes to take charge of the Government himself, and to assume the responsibility of settling questions with foreign Governments. He assumes to take upon himself the responsibility of saying how a great naval Power should be supplied in accordance with the customs of civilized nations. In other words, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations assumes the authority properly belonging to one of the Executive Departments of the Government, by appealing to this House to check the action of the Secretary of the Navy in reference to one of the recognized channels through which the Government communicates with the remotest corners of the earth. There must be some motive for this. I believe that it is an excellent motive, and as it has often been alluded to on this floor that the excellent chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is in intimate connection with the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the President-elect, this must mean peace. It must mean peace at any price, peace at the cost of the Navy, peace at the cost of the character and dignity of the Government.

The questions which are involved in this meager appropriation for your Navy underlie all the appropriations by this Congress with regard to our foreign relations; that is, our diplomatic relations with commercial Powers. You cannot cut down your Navy at home and maintain it well abroad; that is, at all suitable to the dignity and character of a first-rate commercial Power. If we cut our Navy down in the manner proposed we cannot be expected to enter into competition with France, Great Britain, Russia, or even Turkey. We cannot demand the passage of the Hellespont or accomplish any other object which we may have in view if we deprive our navy-yards of the appropriations which are needed for the repair of vessels which we now have in our service, nor can we build there the ships which the public service may require.

These navy-yards represent the invested capital of the people in their naval power. The machine-shops of a great naval Power are of the first importance, not only for the purpose of keeping in repair the vessels which are in commission, but also for the purpose of launching, when needed, first-class ships in the shortest time possible. The naval Powers of the world with whom we have to compete have under their control unlimited resources for building vessels of war within the shortest time, and in maintaining the position which we hold among the great nations of the earth our navy-yards should not be behind any others in capacity and efficiency.

The reduction of our Navy as is proposed may be an economy for the moment. It enables the industrious chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to add, in a note to this bill, that he has reduced the expenses of the Government some two millions and more of dollars. But, sir, it is not wise economy. Whatever momentary gratification he may be able to secure from this short-sighted policy he is welcome to it. It may, too, be some satisfaction to this House in its last moments to believe that it has lessened the expenses of the Government, so far as our Navy is concerned, some two and a half million dollars. Still, sir, this Government has its duty to perform. It has obligations to maintain, and they cannot be maintained without expense, the labors of the Committee on Appropriations to the contrary notwithstanding.

I admit that the policy here pursued may be in the interest of certain Government contractors, in the interest of men who will take from the Government work which would be better and more cheaply done at our own navy-yards. I believe that it is not to the interest of economy. I think vessels built for this Government by private enterprise could have been built cheaper at our navy-yards.

Mr. SPALDING. Are we under the five-minutes rule?

The CHAIRMAN. We will not be under the five-minutes rule until the expiration of the half hour allowed for general debate.

Mr. CHANLER. What I wish is to draw the attention of the House particularly to the matter which is now before us. In my opinion it would be cheaper for this Government to keep up its navy-yards and to provide for the construction by the Government itself of its own vessels of war. We should have our own machine-shops as a school for the education of first-class mechanics, so as to be prepared at any moment to supply efficiently the needs of the Government. We should employ the first mechanical genius of the country in these shops, so as to build in the best way and at the cheapest rates the great vessels of war which we must build at some time or other. New experiments must be tried, as new systems of naval warfare are daily being introduced, and will continue to be introduced. Notwithstanding we were the first to try iron-clad vessels, yet we are to-day retrograding so far as their construction is concerned. We are not, as we should be, engaged in a scientific development of naval architecture. In other words, Mr. Chairman, this false spirit of economy is depriving the United States of one of the grand means of protecting itself—a means which every other Government in the world is to-day most sedulously seeking. I wish, sir, to enter my solemn protest against that spirit of economy which seems to actuate gentlemen here as a false spirit of economy in cutting down appropriations in defiance of the interests of the nation, and in direct opposition to the recommendation of those who know better what appropriations are needed in reference to the Navy than the Committee on Appropriations—I mean, of course, the Navy Department, which is one of the executive branches of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. How many minutes remain for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I intend to make a few remarks, and then to withdraw my amendment, in order to make it $250,000, which I understand to be the amount of the estimate. I think that the Navy Department, in making this estimate for $250,000 for the navy-yard in Brooklyn, has exercised all the economy possible on the occasion. I do not believe that it should be cut down in this way by the committee. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how much was estimated for the navy-yard at Boston? We can then compare the amount with the amount here appropriated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee cut down the estimate for the Boston navy-yard $30,000, while they cut down the estimate for the navy-yard at Brooklyn $150,000. I do not wish to go into a comparison of one navy-yard with another, but I think it will not be denied that the Brooklyn navy-yard is the most important in the country, requiring more money in every department of its expenses than any other. And I mean no disrespect to any gentleman of the committee when I say that it is a small thing to cut down the Brooklyn navy-yard in this way, when only small reductions are made in the other navy-yards.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If my friend from New York will look upon page 121 of the estimates, which I presume he has before him, he will see that the Secretary of the Navy reports that he has a balance of appropriations on hand of over eight hundred and sixteen thousand dollars. I will state what is known to every gentleman, that during the war we made immense appropriations for these navy-yards, and on the 1st of July, 1868, there were $816,000 standing to the credit of the New York navy-yard unexpended, and $87,000 standing to the credit of the Boston navy-yard. The Committee on Appropriations did not think it necessary, with these large balances standing to the credit of the navy-yards, to make large additional appropriations when they did not seem to be required.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether that balance was not for the last fiscal year; and whether we are not now making an appropriation not for the present but for the next fiscal year. When that balance of $800,000 was taken into the account in making the appropriation it was for the present or current fiscal year; consequently it has no place in this discussion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As a matter of course it has a place in the discussion, because there is $160,000 to expend this year, and it is sufficient to put the navy-yard in such condition that only $100,000 will be demanded at the close of the year.

Mr. PIKE. But it does not appear that it is all expended now.

Mr. ROBINSON. It shows that at the Brooklyn navy yard they take good care of the public money, and save as much as possible for future operations.

One word about another provision of the bill. Section three provides that hereafter the Marine corps shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, &c., making a reduction. I trust when we come to that part of the bill the section will be stricken out. I think it disgraceful to so reduce the number of these officers. The Marine corps is already too small for the country's defense—smaller in proportion than it is in any other civilized nation. One of that corps is a man who performed wonders in New Orleans. He went there when the rebellion was raging, took down a rebel flag, and hoisted the American colors.

A MEMBER. Was it not General BUTLER who did that?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, sir; it was not General BUTLER; it was Colonel Broome, of the Marine corps, in my district. He went to New Orleans four days before General BUTLER did, took down a rebel flag, and hoisted the stars and stripes. He fought through the whole war under Farragut, whose good opinion he has won. Now you propose to make him stand at the same box with the rest of the boys, and draw out a lot as to whether, after all his glorious service, he shall be allowed to continue in that arm of the service, which he has rendered so illustrious during the whole of the war. I say it would be disgraceful, and I hope that the section will be entirely stricken out. Death will come to that arm of our defense if you declare that it is already too large and attempt to reduce it. It would be disgraceful to the country and to morality to order a lottery for the purpose of seeing who of these brave officers shall be stricken from this arm of our national defense, and I trust it will not be done. And now as the time allowed for general debate has about expired, I move to strike out $100,000 for the navy-yard at New York and insert in lieu thereof $250,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard at Philadelphia:
For repairs of all kinds, $30,000.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to strike out $50,000 and insert $25,000. I do this because Congress has already determined to abandon the Philadelphia navy-yard at the earliest practicable day. It has accepted League Island, and directed it to be prepared for a naval station. The sum of $25,000 will therefore cover all the necessary repairs at the Philadelphia yard. If $50,000 is appropriated it will lead to improvements and extension of buildings there. The property now in the navy-yard, although but a small yard, will probably yield the Government when sold, as applicable to the new institution, $2,000,000. There was at the close of the last year a balance of $151,000 remaining over for the Philadelphia yard. That balance, I apprehend, as the chairman of the committee says, has been expended by this time, and it has been very improperly expended in purchasing tools, many of which are old ones, which the workmen declare they cannot work with. They say they will not undertake a job of work if they are to be held responsible for the loss of time and damage caused by the destruction of the stock worked upon. I am therefore disposed to cut down the appropriation to the smallest sum that will answer for the present purposes of the yard. There are some things that it is necessary should be kept in repair. There are docks that may be removed at very little expense and put up again. There are other matters that require to be done, and $25,000 will be ample for that purpose. The Secretary of the Navy has asked for an appropriation of $10,000 for making a survey of League Island and suggesting a plan for its gradual improvement. That appropriation, I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will come properly in the miscellaneous bill. When it comes up I shall support it, and I hope during the next Congress to see an order made for the sale of the Philadelphia yard, and the application of the fund thus created to the improvement of the new and enlarged station.

Mr. O'NEILL. I concur to some extent in what has been said by my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] relative to the appropriation for the Philadelphia navy-yard, but I presume the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the committee itself has looked very closely into the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy of the expenditures required at that station. I suppose they know well what is required to be done there, and I have no doubt they have cut down the appropriations asked by the Secretary as much as they possibly could under the circumstances.

Now, sir, I am in favor, as my colleague is, of making an appropriation to survey the territory which has been given by the city of Philadelphia and accepted by the Government for a naval station at League Island, and I am willing to see a large part of this appropriation—say ten or fifteen thousand dollars—transferred for that purpose, and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will permit that to be done, leaving thirty-five or forty thousand dollars for repairs. I am of those who believe in keeping the Government property in repair. I also believe that all buildings belonging to the Government should be kept in good order at all times, and not be permitted to go to destruction for want of proper appropriations.

While, therefore, I am satisfied that we should not put up new buildings in the Philadelphia navy-yard, yet I do not wish to see the buildings already there neglected. It will take, of course, several years to carry to completion the work to be done at League Island after it is commenced, which I hope will be at an early day; hence I am anxious to see an appropriation for its survey made at once. I think it might be put in this bill, although the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations informed me this morning that it would come more probably in a miscellaneous appropriation bill. My idea is that we should now get ready to prepare the plans of the docks, buildings, and the various structures necessary for naval purposes, so that the real work of constructing what will be when finished the greatest naval station in the world should be begun. But I say that, unless with the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in my suggestion for the survey, I am not in favor of cutting down this appropriation if it is not more than is necessary, and which I understand is to be applied to repairs of buildings, and not to repairs of vessels.

Mr. WELKER. I would ask the gentleman if he will be satisfied with an appropriation of $25,000 in this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL. I will be satisfied with what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will say is absolutely necessary to repair the present buildings, provided he will let an appropriation be made in this bill to go on with the survey of the League Island navy-yard. I am perfectly willing to take ten or fifteen thousand dollars from the amount proposed for repairs and with it proceed with the survey.

Mr. WELKER. I ask the question because the members representing the navy-yard at Philadelphia do not agree as to what they want.

Mr. O'NEILL. We do agree entirely as to the necessity of an early survey, and as to its great importance to our naval interests. We can do much better with a smaller appropriation to the old yard than we can with delay in commencing the work at League Island.

Mr. WELKER. I understand that it is proposed to sell this navy-yard at Philadelphia next year, and I want to ask these gentlemen representing Philadelphia whether the navy-yard will not stay there without any appropriation for another year, and whether we might not strike out this appropriation entirely?

Mr. O'NEILL. It is not designed to sell the Philadelphia navy-yard next year. I wish this House in its liberality would give us enough to build the League Island yard, so that in two or three years we might have it finished, and the Government then might have the benefit of the proceeds of the sale of the territory of the old yard, which would amount to nearly two million dollars, and cover the expense of the construction of the new navy-yard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment so as to make the amount $20,000. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who last spoke [Mr. O'NEILL] referred to the amount which would be satisfactory to me. Now, I presume I have less to do with the amount of appropriations than any other member of the House, because my views do not correspond with the views of the majority. In regard to this matter of the appropriation for the Philadelphia navy-yard, I will say that there was nothing before the Committee on Appropriations in relation to this League Island navy-yard excepting a communication asking a small amount for the survey. There was nothing before the committee to indicate that the Navy Department proposed to go on there and build a navy-yard. But on the other hand an appropriation of $73,000 was asked for repairs for the present navy-yard at Philadelphia. We found upon examination that there was an unexpended balance of $151,000 heretofore appropriated. Acting upon the principle we have acted upon in regard to other navy-yards we proposed the sum of $50,000. But I am disposed to yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and to agree to his amendment reducing the amount to $25,000. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman accept the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. O'NEILL,] making the appropriation $35,000, $10,000 to be applicable to a survey of the yard?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I most certainly do not, because it has no business in this appropriation bill. It may be a proper item in the miscellaneous appropriation bill, though I will not say about that now.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would ask the gentleman to accept my amendment now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot. The amendment of Mr. KELLEY was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause:

Navy-yard at Pensacola:
For preservation of the yard and the necessary repairs of all kinds, $30,000.

Mr. ARNELL. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] what amount was appropriated last year for this navy-yard?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amount appropriated last year was $30,000.

The Clerk read the following:

Naval station at Key West:
For necessary repairs of wharves and buildings, $2,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the clause just read by adding the following:

Provided, That paymasters' clerks employed at the several yards and naval stations may be paid, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, a sum per annum not exceeding the average sum paid to all other clerks employed in said navy-yards and naval stations respectively.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal to my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] not to compel me to press a point of order on his amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I offer this amendment at the instance of one of the officials in the Navy Department, who says that there is great inequality existing at the several navy-yards and naval stations in the payment of these clerks; the clerks of paymasters receiving only about one thousand dollars a year, while the clerks of other bureaux receive from fifteen to eighteen hundred dollars a year. The only object of my amendment is to equalize the pay of the different clerks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will so modify his amendment as to equalize the other way, and bring down the other clerks to the paymasters' clerks, I may go with him.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; if that will satisfy the gentleman I will modify the amendment to accommodate him.

The amendment was modified accordingly. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] contemplates additional legislation, and is, therefore, not in order on this bill; beside, it is not germane to the part of the bill to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The following clause was read:

Provided, That all amounts appropriated for the support of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, the beneficiaries therein, the pay of officers, repairs, contingent and other expenses, shall be charged to and paid from the income of the naval pension fund.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] to the clause just read. It provides that the pay of officers, repairs, contingent and other expenses of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, shall be charged to and paid from the income of the naval pension fund. I understand that the naval pension fund is derived from a certain portion of the prize money of the Navy, which has been set apart for the purpose of paying out of its income the pensioners of the Navy Department. If I have not been misinformed, the rate of interest allowed upon that fund has been reduced to three per cent. per annum. It is proposed by this proviso to divert the income of that fund from the channel now fixed by law, and by this independent legislation to use it for purposes not now known to the law, and in fact contrary to its terms.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why not raise the point of order upon this proviso that it is independent legislation, and therefore not in order in this appropriation bill?

Mr. STEVENS. I raise the point of order upon this proviso.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is too late to raise the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] rise for the purpose of making the point of order?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; he did not.

Mr. STEVENS. I intended when I rose to make the point of order, Mr. Chairman; but not being familiar with parliamentary rules—

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman states that he rose for the purpose of making the point of order, then the point is made in time.

Mr. STEVENS. I rose for the purpose of making the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. STEVENS. The point of order I make is that this is new legislation, diverting as it does the income of the pension fund in a direction unknown to the existing law and contrary to it, the law having set apart the income of the pension fund for the payment of naval pensioners.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now, I raise a point of order. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] rose, as I understand, to make an amendment to strike out the proviso.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman misunderstood me. No word or syllable of my language gave any such intimation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Did not the gentleman from New Hampshire speak against the proviso?

Mr. STEVENS. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist that the point is raised too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair distinctly put to the gentleman from New Hampshire the question whether he had risen for the purpose of raising the point. In this House the word of the gentleman concerned is, upon such a matter as this, taken as conclusive; and the gentleman from New Hampshire having stated that he had risen for the purpose of raising the point the Chair ruled that he was in time; and that the point was well taken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not question the gentleman's statement; but I do say that he did not take his point of order until he had discussed the matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit that it is too late for the gentleman from Illinois to discuss this question unless he takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order. The Chair has ruled that the point of order raised by the gentleman from New Hampshire is well taken.

The Clerk read the following:

For expenses of Naval Observatory, namely:

For wages of one instrument maker, one messenger, one porter, and three watchmen; for keeping grounds in order and repairs to buildings and inclosures; for fuel, light, and office furniture, and for stationery, chemicals for batteries, postage, and freight, and contingent, $10,000.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by making the appropriation $13,500, instead of $10,000. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will not object to this amendment. I am assured that this increase in the amount is absolutely necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The sum proposed in the gentleman's amendment corresponds with the estimate of the Department; but the committee in cutting down some of the estimates cut this down to $10,000. After the explanation of the gentleman, I will not object to increasing the amount by adding $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to these appropriations for the Naval Observatory. I know it was stated in one of the reports—the report of the Superintendent of the Observatory, I think—that the very valuable transit instrument, one of the only three of the kind now in operation in the world, is in danger of being seriously injured by the imperfection of the building in which it is placed. I think an expenditure of $5,000 has been recommended as necessary to insure the proper preservation of the instrument. I would like to learn from the gentleman from Illinois what has been done by the committee in reference to this matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee on Appropriations have had no such information on that subject. I understand that some clerk or employé of the Department came into the committee-room with some memorandum; but it has not been brought to the attention of the committee, and we have no knowledge whatever on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will permit me to say that one gentleman connected with the Observatory called on me this morning and suggested that the additional amount provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] already adopted, would be sufficient to cover the expenses of the current year.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to inquire whether that additional sum could be employed for the purpose I have suggested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. From the statement of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] it would seem that those having charge of the Observatory think it could be.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will call his attention to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, page 83, where Commodore Sands speaks of this matter, as follows:

"The special estimate embraces an item for the erection of a suitable frame building for the reception of the new transit circle. Our last three years' experience shows the remounting of the circle in a proper observing room to be necessary, for the following reasons:

"The present observing room is the worst possible for an astronomical instrument, on account of the thickness of its brick walls. The sources of inconvenience are—

"1. It is impossible to secure that equality of the internal and external temperature which is indispensable to good observations.

"2. In the daytime even the two ends of the instrument may show five or ten degrees difference of temperature, owing to the intense heat of the copper roof and the comparative coolness of the walls.

"3. In the winter and spring a sudden rise of temperature after a cold snap causes a heavy deposit of dew over the entire room and instrument, to the great danger of the latter through rusting of the steel.

"It may be remarked that the great superiority of wooden walls has been almost universally recognized by astronomers for twenty years. Notably, the elder Struve, forty years ago, at Dorpat, suffered the same inconveniences to such an extent that in building the Pulkowa observatory he made the observing rooms entirely of wood, as a work of necessity.

"The masonry on which the instrument is supported is altogether insufficient in size and strength. Hence—

"1. The azimuthal error is more unsteady than in many small transits in second class observatories.

"2. The mortar of the masonry is gradually disintegrating.

"3. The tops of the marble piers are gradually spreading apart, so that the microscopes on one pier have to be pushed in every few weeks in order to see the circle divisions."

This new and very valuable instrument, costing in Germany $8,000, I think, is in such condition, in consequence of the rusting of its steel parts, that unless we make this appropriation it will become utterly valueless.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that I had no conversation on the particular point to which the gentleman alludes, but I did understand the complaint was that the appropriation had been reduced, and its restoration to the estimate would be satisfactory.

Mr. PIKE. That ought to be explained. Thirteen thousand five hundred dollars was satisfactory for the purpose of keeping up the Observatory as it was, as they had given up the idea of having an appropriation for this transit circle. They thought that this was the lowest they could get along with.

Mr. PIKE's amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of three aids, $4,000:

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to increase that to $5,400. Commodore Sands concludes his report as follows:

"I earnestly renew the recommendation of last year, that the pay of the civilians engaged in astronomical and other duties at the Observatory be increased. Their duties are not those of clerks or computers only, but such as require, indispensably, a knowledge of astronomy and general science."

These three gentlemen are astronomers—men of science—and in this bill it is proposed to pay them only a salary of $1,383 each, while, as will be seen in the appropriation preceding this one, the clerk is allowed $1,500 a year. I think it is no more than fair that these men of science should have a salary each of $1,800, and therefore I have moved to increase the appropriation to $5,400. One thousand three hundred dollars a year is no adequate reward for requirements necessary for the services which these gentlemen are required to perform. I trust, therefore, that my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will not interpose any objection. It is in compliance with the recommendations of Commodore Sands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment, as I am to all amendments which propose to increase the salaries of any of these officers. Heretofore these men have been contented with this salary, and we have appropriated all that was asked for.

Mr. SPALDING. Are not these salaries fixed by law?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They are fixed by the act of May 21, 1864. If we adopt the gentleman's amendment we will thereby change the existing law. I hope he will not press it.

Mr. SPALDING. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point comes too late. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to insert the following:

For the purchase of meteorological instruments and the building of a brick tower for mounting them, for the purchase of other instruments, and for the erection of a suitable frame building for the transit circuit, $5,870.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point that that amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is an appropriation recommended by the Superintendent of the United States Naval Observatory, Commodore Sands, and I beg to call the attention of gentlemen who are in favor of increased astronomical and other knowledge that this whole appropriation is comparatively small compared with the greatness of our commerce and navigation. This Observatory is substantially all we do in that regard, and the superintendent recommends that this appropriation is necessary to carry on the astronomical operations of that establishment. I remember very well, as doubtless other gentlemen do, the inextinguishable laughter that a certain portion of the country indulged in when the President of the United States, John Quincy Adams, with unsurpassed beauty of figure, spoke of "building light-houses in the sky." He referred to these astronomical investigations and studies which enabled travelers by land and sea to use the ever-changing relations of the stars for the same purpose that we build light-houses. Mr. Adams was a man of great learning, foresight, and liberality, and his wish was respected in the establishment of this Observatory, which has proved a great success. Its observations command the respect of the world. I hope the amendment I have offered will meet with the approval of the House. These instruments are things that deteriorate in the lapse of time by ordinary wear and tear, and in the improvement and advancement of science these learned gentlemen find it necessary to obtain new instruments by which they can carry on their daily and nightly observations. They ask only for this inconsiderable sum—a mere bagatelle out of the millions we are appropriating; and I appeal to gentlemen who appreciate the importance of promoting this scientific object not to withhold the appropriation asked for. I trust the House will vote for the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope not.

Mr. MAYNARD. Of course, I understand the gentleman does not appreciate the value of the appropriation. He regards it as utterly valueless. But I was appealing to the other gentlemen of the House who do understand the value of it, [laughter,] and the importance of maintaining the honor and scientific reputation of our country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do understand it. I ask for a vote on the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule under which the Chair overruled the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. This comes under the latter part of the clause. Any amendment is in order which does not conflict with an existing law; and even an existing law can be changed by an amendment in relation to the salaries of public officers. The gentleman from Illinois is familiar with the rule.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. But, if the Chairman will permit me, I am not familiar with any rule which permits an appropriation to be put on here for public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. That comes under the head of contingencies recommended by the Department, as has been ruled uniformly from the foundation of the Government, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I beg pardon. I do not know it.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, there were—ayes 39, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MAYNARD, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 66.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the committee rise; it is now four o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope not. The question being taken, it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Provisions and Clothing:

To meet the demands upon the bureau for freight and transportation of stores, for candles, fuel; for tools and repairing same at eight inspections; for books and blanks; for stationery; for furniture, and repairs of same in offices of paymasters and inspectors; for telegrams and postage, tolls and ferriages, and for ice, $75,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. It strikes me this is a very considerable sum. I have endeavored, without success, to get the committee to make a reasonable allowance for the benefit of gentleman who are engaged in scientific observations. Therefore, to continue the economy and save something, I move to strike out $75,000 and insert $50,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman, of course, does not understand this appropriation is for ice alone. It is for all the articles named in the paragraph, ice included.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to reduce it to $50,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee on Appropriations have cut this down to the lowest point. We do not care to deprive the sailors in the tropics of ice.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows, under the head of "Marine corps:—"

Provided, That the number of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates authorized and allowed to be enlisted into the Marine corps of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed and declared to be fifteen hundred and no more.

Mr. PIKE. I raise the point of order on this proviso that the law fixes another number of men.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to see the law.

Mr. PIKE. It was passed since the rebellion commenced, and it fixes the number of men either at twenty-five hundred or three thousand. I forget which. It is independent legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For contingencies, namely: freight; ferrage; toll; cartage; wharfage; purchase and repair of boats; compensation of judge advocates; per diem for attending courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and for constant labor; house rent in lieu of quarters, and commutation for quarters to officers on ship-board; burial of deceased marines; printing, stationery, postage, telegraphing; apprehension of deserters;

oil, candles, gas; repairs of gas and water fixtures; water rent; forage, straw, barrack furniture; furniture for officers' quarters; bed sacks, wrapping paper, oil cloth, crash, rope, twine, spades, shovels, axes, picks, carpenters' tools; keep of a horse for the messenger; repairs to fire engines; purchase and repair of engine hose; purchase of lumber for benches, mess tables, bunks, &c.; repairs to public carryall; purchase and repair of harness; purchase and repair of handcarts and wheelbarrows; scavenging, purchase and repair of galleys, cooking stoves, ranges, &c.; stoves where there are no grates; gravel, &c., for parade grounds; repair of pumps; furniture for staff and commanding officers' offices; brushes, brooms, buckets, paving, and for other purposes, $50,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out the words "and so forth" wherever they occur. It is language that has no business in a statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] whether we might not reduce the expense a little by striking out "repairs to the public carryall." In my country we use our carryalls without much being expended in the way of repairs. We tie up the wheels a little and sometimes put a stick in place of the springs; and then, as to the harness, a piece of rope frequently supplies the place of the lines. [Laughter.] We spend nothing for an object like this; and as economy is apparently our ruling passion, as we have economy on the brain, as some one suggests, might we not economize here in a very important matter by striking out this item? I will not make the motion myself, but I call attention to it.

The Clerk then read the second section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That each and every seaman, ordinary seaman, or landsman who shall perform the duty of a fireman or coal-heaver on board of any vessel of war shall be entitled to and shall receive a compensation at the rate of thirty-three cents per day for the time they shall thus be employed as firemen and coal-heavers, and which shall be in addition to their compensation as seamen, ordinary seamen, or landsmen, as aforesaid.

Mr. PIKE. I make the point of order on that section that the law fixes the pay of seamen, ordinary seamen, and landsmen, and that this proposes to change both their duties and their compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does it increase their compensation?

Mr. PIKE. It increases their compensation. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, you have increased the pay of a clerk, why not that of sailors?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken. The rule specifically provides that the salaries of officers may be increased in an appropriation bill.

Mr. PIKE. Does the Chair consider these men officers?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would give the benefit to sailors or soldiers of a rule made specifically for officers, and he rules that the gentleman's point is not well taken.

Mr. PIKE. Then I move to strike out the section. I would like to know the reason for increasing this compensation. If I understand it, this proposition was introduced into the Senate as having some more or less remote connection with engineering. The number of engineers was to be diminished and increased pay given to seamen. I believe that this proposition was abandoned by the originator of it as entirely impracticable, and why it should be galvanized here now and put in this bill I do not see.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The section will stand upon its own merits, although, as the gentleman has referred to the Senator who drew up this provision, I can state in the same direction that it was put into a bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate last year, and the reason for it I think will impress itself upon the common sense of the House. As the law now stands, every steam frigate goes to sea with a certain number, and that a very large number, of men employed exclusively as firemen, to whom a high rate of wages is paid. After the frigate goes to sea they do not use steam one day in twenty, and the only use that these firemen are put to is to eat their rations and draw their pay. It is found that the seamen on board the vessels, and whom it is necessary to have there, would be very willing and are anxious to do this duty for this little additional compensation. If this section shall be adopted it will cause a very large—I may say an astonishingly large saving of the public money without any detriment to the public interest.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire only to say what the gentleman from Illinois has omitted; that this will make our service in harmony with those of all other nations. We are the only nation that maintains a corps of firemen and coal-heavers, and we pay them more than we pay sailors. Every other nation has a provision just such as this, adding to the pay of the most industrious sailors for doing this work, and saving, as the gentleman has said, the rations and pay of the whole number of firemen and coal-heavers.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend by striking out the last line of this section. It is as I supposed it was; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is a very excellent gentleman. The only difficulty with him is that if he but understood the management of a ship he would pursue a different course. Why he would pay a fireman extra for his services as a sailor he has not yet stated. I suppose he is aware that a fireman now receives a higher rate of compensation than a sailor receives. He should also be aware that the regulations of our Navy provide that no commander of a vessel shall use steam on any occasion unless there is a special necessity for it, and that the necessity for it must be recorded in the log. That regulation of our Navy is precisely like the regulation of the British navy on that point: that all vessels must go under sail without some pressing necessity for the use of steam. And the great complaint against the Navy Department is that our vessels are now so constructed that they must go under steam while they should be so that they could go under sail. The complaint is that our steam vessels cannot go under sail, while it should be that the whole crew should be shipped for the purpose of managing the vessel, that a ship of war should have the force necessary to manage it as a ship of war.

We have provided by law that the Navy should have eighty-five hundred men, to be distributed among about forty vessels. Now, it must be evident, that all those men are not necessary for the working of those vessels. It is absurd to say that eighty-five hundred men are necessary to work forty vessels. But they are so distributed as to make those vessels efficient as men of war. Now, there is no need of any provision requiring the paymaster of a vessel to distinguish a fireman or coal-heaver from any other man on the vessel, to transfer him from one department to another, to keep separate accounts with each man, and pay him thirty-three cents per day every time he may act as fireman or coal-heaver. It should be so arranged that the master of a vessel may manage his crew as he likes. Every man on board the vessel should be under the control of the master of the vessel for any purpose he may choose to use him, whether to fight the vessel or to manage it in any other way.

It does seem to me absurd to have such regulations that whenever the master of a vessel has occasion to use a man for one purpose he should be paid differently from what he is paid when used for some other purpose. That it seems to me would be by no means in the interest of good discipline on board ship. For these reasons I hope this section will be stricken out. I know of no such regulation in the British navy, and I have understood that there is no corresponding regulation in that navy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] may have informed himself differently upon this matter. But I have never heard of any such regulation, and I have given some considerable attention to such subjects.

Mr. KELLEY. Not only have I informed myself of that, but also that the maintenance of such a corps of men is the source of great discontent among our men.

Mr. SPALDING. It strikes me that this provision is a very sensible one. I know of no reason why able-bodied seamen on board a man-of-war may not perform the duties of firemen and coal-heavers as well as men specially employed for that purpose. We propose to offer them the inducement of thirty-three cents per day additional pay whenever they see fit to perform that duty.

And certainly on board a man-of-war room is of some account. I am not prepared to say how many of these firemen or coal-heavers are ordinarily shipped on board a man-of-war, but there must be a goodly number of them. By the arrangement proposed in this section we dispense with all those supernumeraries, and take able-bodied seamen. And then we provide that if they shall perform the services of firemen or coal-heavers they shall receive this additional pay of thirty-three cents per day.

There is no difficulty in keeping the accounts and paying these men. A certain set of seamen are classed as firemen and are to be allowed this additional pay; and when on any one day out of twenty or thirty the vessel is propelled by steam-power, then these men are called into action with this additional pay. That is the effect of the proposition; and I do not see any force in the argument used by the chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. PIKE] in opposition to the measure. It strikes me as a measure of economy, one that will save expense by dispensing with supernumeraries on board of these vessels of war, which is certainly a very desirable object.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that we have already provided that there shall be on board our ships eighty-five hundred men of various grades, sailors, firemen, coal-heavers, &c., and their pay is fixed. This proposition is designed to give a certain portion of these men additional pay. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. SPALDING. The proposition is to give to able-bodied seamen additional pay if they will perform the services of firemen, thereby dispensing with the firemen altogether.

Mr. PIKE. No, that is not proposed.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will let us get through with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. WOODWARD. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. PIKE to strike out section two, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the marine corps shall hereafter consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, one adjutant and inspector, one paymaster, one quartermaster, one assistant quartermaster, twelve captains, eighteen first lieutenants, eighteen second lieutenants; and the sergeants and corporals and clerks are to be reduced two fifths; the selection of officers to be mustered out of service or reduced to be determined by lot among the officers and non-commissioned officers at present in commission.

Mr. BANKS. I raise the point of order on this section that it changes existing law and is not in order in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The section will be stricken out.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. GARFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1870, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering amendments as follows:

At the bottom of page 3 insert the following: Provided, That all amounts appropriated for the support of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, the beneficiaries therein, the pay of officers, repairs, contingent and other expenses, shall be charged to and paid from the income of the naval pension fund.

On page 11, after the first paragraph with reference to the Marine corps, insert the following:

Provided, That the number of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates authorized and allowed to be enlisted into the Marine corps of the United States be, and the same is hereby, fixed and declared to be fifteen hundred and no more.

Insert the following as section three:

And be it further enacted, That the officers of the Marine corps shall hereafter consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, one adjutant and inspector, one paymaster, one quartermaster, one assistant quartermaster, twelve captains, eighteen first lieutenants, eighteen second lieutenants; and the sergeants and corporals and clerks are to be reduced two fifths; the selection of officers to be mustered out of service or reduced to be determined by lot among the officers and non-commissioned officers at present in commission.

Those two provisos and this section have been stricken out in Committee of the Whole upon points of order. My object in moving to suspend the rules is that they may be reinserted in the bill.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw his motion as it will only throw this bill over for a week.

Mr. BANKS. I decline to withdraw the motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope the House will vote it down.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon, (at twenty-five minutes after four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. RICE and Mr. ABBOTT as additional members of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, in pursuance of the order of December 21, 1868.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of Eliphalet Brown, jr., praying compensation for services rendered as an artist in the Japan expedition under Commodore Perry; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of George F. Peers, of Appomattox Court-House, Virginia, praying to be relieved from disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a series of resolutions, in the nature of a petition to Congress, adopted at Macon, Georgia, January 1, 1869, at a mass meeting, in which is set forth a deplorable condition of things in the State of Georgia, and the parties ask a remedy from Congress, and suggest, among other things, the adoption of a bill introduced by myself. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Francis T. Stribling, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of James Murdaugh, praying the removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CATTELL presented the memorial of the sugar refiners of Philadelphia, praying for a new classification of sugars for tariff purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a petition from a number of capitalists, stating that they understand that a proposition is pending before Congress to endow the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and the eastern division of the Union Pacific Railroad Company with a Government subsidy of $16,000, $32,000, and $48,000 per mile, according to the nature of the territory; and they are further informed that these companies have already had granted to them forty sections, or twenty-five thousand acres of land per mile, and that it is proposed to give them the privilege of mortgaging the road for an amount equal to the Government subsidy; that in addition to the grant of lands these subsidies, at the rate named, will, for both roads, amount to the enormous aggregate of $125,000,000, and very probably $130,000,000; that the memorialists will undertake the construction of either or both of these roads, with the same land grants, and with a Government subsidy of $15,000 per mile for the entire line, with the right of mortgage to the same amount; thus making a saving to the Treasury of the United States of $75,000,000; that they will give bonds equal to the amount of the subsidy for the completion of both roads in ten years, the bonds to be indorsed by capitalists representing $100,000,000. I offer this memorial because one of the capitalists who signs it is a constituent of mine.

Mr. CONKLING. Who are the memorialists?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Franklin Haven, George B. Upton, John T. Coolidge, S. S. Dana, Henry J. Gardner, George Baty Blake, Glidden A. Williams, Joseph Nickleson & Co., John J. Blair, and W. S. Williams. In offering this memorial I desire, however, to say that I am opposed to the granting of any subsidies for railroads excepting where the faith of the nation is pledged. I believe that the present rate at which railroads are being built across the continent by the aid of the Government shows that they can be built at a sufficiently rapid rate without that aid, and with it that they are more likely to be well constructed when they are not unreasonably hastened in order to get the subsidy. But if we are to grant subsidies, I am in favor of granting the smallest amount. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICE presented the petition of members of the bar of the eastern district of Arkansas, asking for an additional term of the United States circuit court for that district; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the members of the bar of Garrard and adjoining counties in Kentucky, praying that Lancaster, the county seat of Garrard county, be selected as one of the places for holding the district court of the United States in the new district proposed to be established in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying that in any amendment to the Constitution of the United States to extend or regulate suffrage there be no distinction between men and women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying that the right of suffrage be granted to the women of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLE presented the petition of Jonathan Elliot, late commercial agent of the United States at San Domingo and Porto Plata, praying compensation for services rendered and reimbursement of money expended in negotiating a treaty with the Dominican republic in the year 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of C. B. Hood, praying the removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THAYER presented the memorial of Chauncey A. Horr, praying that he may be compensated for injuries received at the hands of Omaha Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand additional copies of the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I am also instructed to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, ten thousand copies of the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue, with the appendices complete.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 967) to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, to the United States, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. If there is no objection to its consideration now—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall object. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. CORBETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 361) for the relief of Helen Lincoln and Heloise Lincoln, and for the withholding of moneys from tribes of Indians holding American captives, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 165) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to appoint guardians or trustees for minor Indian children who may be entitled to pensions or bounties under the existing laws, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 762) to prevent the alienation to foreigners of grants or privileges from the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the bill read at length. It is very brief.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful, without the express consent of Congress first obtained, to assign or transfer to any alien person or foreign corporation, any charter, grant, or privilege given by or derived from the United States and designed to promote or regulate intercourse with any foreign nation or the dominions thereof.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 763) to continue the office of solicitor and naval judge advocate general; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 764) to aid in the construction of the Arkansas and Pacific railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill to give an additional term of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 766) to grant a portion of the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth to aid in the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Missouri river; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDICTMENTS IN THE REBEL STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no other bills or joint resolutions the Calendar is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the bill commonly known as the copper bill—the bill (H. R. No. 1460) regulating the duties on copper and copper ores.

Mr. FERRY. I trust that bill will not be taken up now. I see that the Maryland Senators are out of their seats, and they desire to be heard upon it, both upon the question of taking it up and upon the bill itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to take advantage of the absence of any one, but those Senators are present, I think, within the building. I saw one of them a moment ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What bill is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. The copper bill. I want it acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I think, in the absence of those Senators, it is hardly fair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they are about here, probably in the lobby. I know they take a special interest in it, but I will not press the motion in their absence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 584.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending, made by the Senator from Ohio, to take up the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought the Senator from Ohio had consented to lay that aside until some Senators came in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move, then, to take up Senate bill No. 584.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 584) relating to the time for finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the time for finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States for offenses cognizable by those courts, and which may have been committed since those States went into rebellion, shall be extended for the period of two years from and after those States are or may be restored to representation in Congress; but this provision is not to apply to treason or other political offenses.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by striking out in line seven the words "two years" and inserting "one year."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment was reported by the committee; but it is some time since this bill was introduced, and a good portion of the time has already expired for which it was desirable to extend the period within which to find indictments; and I think the amendment of the committee had best not be concurred in now. I think there can be no objection to making the time two years.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in obedience to law, a copy of rules agreed upon between the Chinese Imperial Government and the ministers of the United States and of other foreign Powers accredited to that Government; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

LOGAN of Illinois, Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, the committee on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 404), providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

Mr. HOWE. If the morning business is concluded, I move to take up the bill which was under consideration at the adjournment last evening.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on this bill I propose to submit some further remarks to the Senate in support of it. I do not think my advocacy of the bill depends in any degree on the fact that Miss Murphey is a woman and one of our fair countrywomen. I place it exclusively on the ground that she was a loyal woman, and that her property was taken for public use. I think her claim is as fair as any imagination can suppose she was; that it is just; that it is sanctioned by the Constitution; and that its payment is required by the Constitution; and I hold that if the Senate rejects it, with the aid of the vote and speech of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] notwithstanding his heavy denunciation of any repudiation of the just claims of the Government, he himself will be guilty of that offense. I hold that if the Senator votes against this bill he will be guilty of repudiation in a case of higher and stronger obligation than that of any of the bonds of the United States or any contract which the United States may have made. In my judgment, this claim is recognized by the highest law known to our Government; and that highest law requires the Senator from Vermont and every other Senator imperatively to vote for the passage of the bill under consideration. That highest law is the Constitution of the United States. I want the country to understand distinctly that if this bill is rejected it will be a naked, clear, and flagitious case of repudiation; and so far as any support or exposition of it that I can give is concerned I am determined that it shall thus be clearly and distinctly presented to the country.

Now, Mr. President, as has been stated by the advocates of this bill, it is supported upon the ground that the Constitution, by its express provision, requires that when property is taken for public use just compensation for it shall be made. The honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber who oppose it, led principally by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] assume that this express provision of the supreme law of the land is met and overruled by implication and deduction from the law of nations; and the honorable Senator from Michigan read from Vattel, a very able writer upon public and national law.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to correct the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I did not cite Vattel; I did not deem it necessary to cite Vattel for any purpose. I read a passage or two from Chancellor Kent.

Mr. DAVIS. What I assert is that the principles upon which the Senator relies for the defeat of this bill are embodied in Vattel in discussing the laws of war between nations who are at war. And here is the substance of what he says, in a very few words, to which I ask the honorable Senator's attention:

"When the sovereign or ruler of the State declares war against another sovereign it is understood that the whole nation declares war against another nation, for the sovereign represents the nation and acts in the name of the whole society."

That is not analogous to our case, because in this country there is no sovereign but the people:

"And it is only in a body and in her national character that one nation has to do with another. Hence, these two nations are enemies, and all the subjects of the one are enemies to all the subjects of the other. In this particular custom and principles are in accord."

Enemies continue such wherever they happen to be. The place of abode is of no consequence here. It is the political ties which determine the character. While a man continues a citizen of his own country he is the enemy of all those with whom his nation is at war. But we must not hence conclude that these enemies may treat each other as such whenever they happen to meet."

Since women and children are subjects of the State and members of the nation they are to be ranked in the class of enemies."

And with respect to things the case is the same as with respect to persons; things belonging to the enemy continue such wherever they are."

Now, Mr. President, here is a succinct statement of the laws of nations that govern the subjects or the citizens of different countries that are at war with each other. If the honorable Senator from Michigan dissents from either of the principles stated in Vattel, as I have read them, I will pause to give him an opportunity of declaring his dissent. I therefore take it for granted that he does not dissent. Some of the gentlemen who have opposed this bill have relied upon by quoting Vattel. I concede that if the laws of nations have any application to the case under consideration those laws are correctly embodied in Vattel as I have read; but I deny that they have any application to this case.

The honorable Senator from Michigan has repeatedly announced himself in about these terms: that Miss Sue Murphey and every citizen of Alabama and of all the southern States in rebellion who remained within the borders of their respective States after the commencement of the war of rebellion were enemies of the United States; that they were so to be treated in their persons and in their property; that just the same principles of law which would apply to British subjects, if the United States was at war with England and would regulate the property and persons of British subjects, would apply without any exception or qualification, after hostilities commenced between the insurgents in the southern States and the United States Government, to the persons and property of the citizens of the States where the rebellion prevailed.

Now, I ask the honorable Senator's attention to a historical fact, and to a principle necessarily springing out of it. During the war of 1812 Michigan was a Territory of the United States, was within the boundary of the United States, and was as much the Territory of the United States as the State of Ohio, although the one was a State and the other a Territory. In August, 1812, the Territory of Michigan was conquered by the arms of England, and on the 16th of September that conquest was consummated by the surrender of Hull and the taking possession of the entire Territory, with very few exceptions, by General Brock, who commanded the English armies. Now, I put this question distinctly to the honorable Senator: when Michigan was thus conquered by the British arms was Michigan enemy's territory? Were the citizens of the Territory of Michigan in its then subjugated and conquered condition enemies of the United States?

Mr. HOWARD. I will answer the honorable Senator when he has finished his remarks, unless he desires an answer now. I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. DAVIS. The course suggested by the honorable Senator, being his pleasure, is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. President, I will proceed to the legitimate reasoning from the premises and principles of the honorable gentleman and his coadjutors in opposition to this bill. There is no law whatever that will make Sue Murphey and the citizens of Alabama enemies to the United States except national law. The gentlemen have argued again and again that the application of national law in this respect is the same to citizens of the United States who are in a state of insurrection as it would be to the subjects of Spain, Great Britain, or any other Power, if our country was at war with them. Now, let us reason what would be the effects and consequences of this principle? By their premises, when Michigan was conquered by the British arms it became enemy's country, and every person resident in it and remaining in it after the conquest assumed the character of an enemy to the United States. The law upon which they rely is stronger than that. It lays down that when two peoples or two nations are at war the citizens and subjects of each are mutually enemies wherever they may be resident. Then, according to the principles relied upon by the honorable Senators and their logic from them, upon the conquest of Michigan in 1812 by the British arms, that Territory became enemy's country and subject to the British power. Following up their principle, that being enemy's country, every person in it, according to the position assumed by the honorable Senator from Michigan, who remained there, would by the operation of the law of nations become an enemy to the United States, and the persons and property of these enemies of the United States resident in Michigan would be subject to the national law, and consequently the British authorities could at once proceed to the confiscation of all the property of the people of Michigan who remained within the boundary of that Territory after the British arms had taken possession of it.

Now, Mr. President, what would result from these principles? General Cass, who was then a colonel in the United States service, was a citizen of Michigan. He became a prisoner, if I recollect aright, by the surrender of Hull. He did not change his residence from the city of Detroit. It continued to be his home. According to the premises and principles of the honorable Senator, General Cass was then a resident of enemy's country, and was himself an enemy of the United States. Is any man within the sound of my voice prepared to make so monstrous an application of the principles of the laws of nations which do not apply except to sovereign, independent nations that are at war with each other?

Let us pursue the argument of the honorable gentlemen a little further. The honorable Senator from New Jersey, if I mistake not, and other gentlemen have contended broadly, unqualifiedly, without restriction or condition, that the laws of nations applied to the case of the late rebellion. Let us examine what this application would lead to. Here was General Thomas, a citizen of the State of Virginia, in the military service of the United States Government, one of the ablest military men that has been exhibited to the country by the operation of this war. At the time that he was serving the United States in obedience to his allegiance to them and his oath to support the Constitution, and to discharge his duties as a military officer, what power, according to the argument and the premises of the honorable gentlemen, could Congress have exercised toward General Thomas? What toward President Johnson? What toward Mr. Justice Wayne, of the Supreme Court? At the time that Thomas was fighting the battle of Mill Spring; at the time he was fighting the battles of Franklin and of Nashville, and planning the campaign which resulted in the glorious victories of Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge, which campaign originated in his military mind, according to the position and principles of the honorable gentlemen he was an enemy to the United States. If the principles of the laws of nations apply to the case he could have been, and was, nothing else. Congress then might have passed a bill to disrobe him of his uniform and epaulettes, to take the sword from his side which he had borne in bloody battles to glorious victories. They might have passed a law expelling him from the country, and forfeiting, according to the military law, what property he had that Congress or the military authorities could seize.

Here was President Johnson, a citizen of a seceding State, whose convention had passed an ordinance of secession. After that had taken place, and that State was deeply involved and one of the most effective parties in the form of States in this war of the rebellion, the party now in power and that insists upon these monstrous doctrines selected him as its candidate for the Vice Presidency and elected him to the office and placed him in the line of constitutional succession which resulted upon the death of President Lincoln.

Mr. Justice Wayne was a citizen of the State of Georgia. He refused to follow in the course which his State led and to abide the fortunes of that State. He acknowledged his higher allegiance to the United States. He therefore refused to go into Georgia or the southern confederacy, and he remained here as a member of the Supreme Court, performing with ability and fidelity the important duties of that illustrious office, as he had done from his appointment under General Jackson.

Now, Mr. President, if the office-seekers, if the men who worship the spoils of victory, if the men who wish to get possession of them, had desired it, if the men who wanted to depose Andrew Johnson from the position of President of the United States which he held, according to my principles, as constitutionally and with as immovable a tenure as that office was ever filled, had desired to carry out their principles and to have given them practical operation, they would have passed a law banishing General Thomas, banishing Andrew Johnson, and Justice Wayne from the States within the Union lines and confiscating their property; and in that way they would have vacated all those high offices. These consequences follow inevitably as logical sequences from the premise of honorable gentlemen that this is a state of case regulated not by the Constitution of the United States, but by national law. In my judgment, the honorable gentlemen cannot get away from this maze of monstrous difficulties in which their positions would necessarily involve them.

Now, I ask the honorable Senator from Michigan—and I intend to ask him several other questions; of course he will answer them in his own good time—I ask him if before the rebellion commenced Alabama was not a part of the United States?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Was it then enemy's country?

Mr. HOWARD. No.

Mr. DAVIS. No; nor never. When did it become enemy's country? Was it by the firing of the first gun of the rebellion? Was it by the ordinance of secession passed by the State? The honorable Senator says that the Government and the people and the convention of Alabama had no authority whatever under the Constitution and outside of rebellion to promulge their ordinance of secession; and I agree with him. It was as much a nullity and of no more effect than if it had never been promulgated by the convention of Alabama. It had no validity. When these troubles began Alabama, the gentleman admits, was friendly territory, was not enemy's territory; Miss Sue Murphey was a friend of our country and Government, not its enemy. I ask the honorable Senator from Michigan, and I ask the honorable Senator from New Jersey, what authoritative power made Alabama enemy's country? What authoritative power made Sue Murphey and the loyal people who were in the State of Alabama enemies to their country? The honorable Senator from Michigan contends that everything which the rebels, or which the rebel States did, or attempted to do toward those ends, was perfectly null and void. I agree with him. It had no effect whatever.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him one question right there?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood him to say that everything that was done by the rebel government was null and void.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. Does he adhere to that principle?

Mr. DAVIS. I do, and I have always maintained it, and I expect always to maintain it. I say there was no government de jure or de facto in the southern confederacy; that is, so far as they attempted to revolutionize and to dissolve their constitutional relations with the United States and its government. I say that everything they attempted to do toward those ends was absolutely null and void and of no effect. I understand that to be the position of the honorable Senator. If he dissents from it, when he chooses to reply to my remarks let him state distinctly his dissent and its ground.

With that position conceded by him and by me, I ask the honorable Senator what authority, what binding act of the southern confederacy, or of any State in the southern confederacy, made the State of Alabama enemy's country, and her people adhering to their highest allegiance to the United States, and keeping their oath to support the Constitution of the United States, enemies of the United States, and placed them in the condition where they were subjected to be treated in their persons and property as would be the subjects of Great Britain if the United States were at war with that Power? There is no such principle. Was not Sue Murphey, in her home before the difficulties commenced, residing in the United States? Was not her home a part of the United States? Was she not residing there in peace, with a loyal and true heart to her country, to the Government, and to the Union? Had she not a right to remain there; and remaining there, within the United States, was she not entitled to the protection and support of the United States in her fidelity to its Government and to its institutions? Certainly she was.

Now, I lay down this position, and I challenge the honorable Senator to refute it either by argument or authority: Alabama was a component part of the United States; it belonged before the war and during the war, and belongs at this time to the United States; it was no less a part of the United States when the rebellion raged with most violence, and when there was most doubt on what side the fortune of war would prevail. At that time Alabama and every foot of territory within her boundary was a part of the United States. Sue Murphey was there under the shield of the Constitution. She was there with this great, imperishable principle protecting her, that if her property was taken for the public use of the United States it was upon the express and constitutional condition of having just compensation made. In the forcible summary of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] all the powers of Alabama, all the powers of the southern confederacy, and all the powers of earth and hell, so long as the Constitution prevailed and ruled, had no authority to change her relations to her country in the home which she had occupied before, in the peaceful protection of which it was the duty of her Government to defend her. Her heart was true and loyal to the flag, to the Union, to the law, to the Constitution; and to say that crimes and acts which gentlemen denounce as having no force and no effect could have nevertheless the operation to make Alabama enemy's country and Sue Murphey an enemy to her country when her heart beat as true to that country and its Government as that of the honorable Senator from Michigan or any citizen within the broad limits of the United States is a perversion of language, of reason, and of moral and political ethics.

Mr. President, my honorable friend from Michigan is an able lawyer. I have known him for many long years; and his ability as a lawyer I have always conceded and now fully recognize. I will state to him one or two principles, not only of our Constitution and the law which it forms, but of national law. Whenever a country or a portion of a country is overrun by a foreign or hostile enemy the subjugation of that country does not make it a part of the enemy's country; it is only a temporary occupation by violence and force of arms; as, for instance, when the English arms conquered Michigan, and when the British arms also conquered a portion of the State of Maine, I deny that the overrunning and the temporary occupation of those portions of the United States by the British arms made them enemy's country. There are but two modes by which any portion of the territory of the United States can be made enemy's country. The one is by negotiation and cession, and the other by war and the necessities of war. When a part of a country or the whole of it is overrun by the enemy's arms and occupied by the enemy the country that is taken possession of by the invading army does not become a part of and is not incorporated with the Government of the invading country until the territory is assured to the party making the conquest by treaty or by long peaceful and undisputed occupation. I concede that the territory of the United States may be detached from the United States in either of these modes, but in none other. The territory must be passed to the foreign state by the treaty-making power, or it must be conquered by the arms of the foreign State and held and possessed by the authorities of the foreign State for such a long course of time in peaceful, quiet, undisputed possession as according to the laws of nations would pass the title to the territory to the invading State.

Was there any such process as that here? Let me take the invasion of the honorable Senator's now State, then Territory, by the British forces during the war of 1812. Suppose there were some citizen of Detroit at that time now living, and after General Harrison bore back the British troops under General Brock across to the British territory it became necessary to take the property of that citizen, who had remained true and loyal to the Government of the United States and continued to live in Detroit all the time, for precisely the same purpose for which the property of Sue Murphey was taken, would the honorable Senator contend that after the enemy had been driven back and the authority of the United States had repossessed itself of the conquered country, and had by its officers constructed forts out of the material and property belonging to a loyal citizen, that loyal citizen would not be entitled to just compensation for his or her property so taken? Mr. President, the thing is preposterous, and its injustice and absurdity are equally revolting; but no more so than in the case under consideration. Here this lady lived within the United States at her former home. She was entitled to have the full protection of the General Government thrown around her person to protect it and all her rights of property. The Government was unable for a time to perform this task in Decatur; but the country and the Government rallied their energies and forces, they drove the insurgents from Decatur, repossessed themselves of the country, reinstated the government, and authority, and laws of the United States, and that Government and those laws have prevailed there without interruption ever since.

But gentlemen say that this town of Decatur was attacked by Hood, on his march north, to get in the rear of General Thomas. That is an argument which reinforces the claim of Miss Murphey. It shows the military exigency that existed for taking her property to build a fort, and it shows the valuable purpose of defense which that property subserved for our armies, our country, the common defense, by taking it and incorporating it into this fortification. Sir, this country never was enemy's country. It never could become enemy's country until it was formally conquered and subjugated by the rebellion, until the success of that war of rebellion had been recognized by the treaty-making power, or until the rebels and insurgents had maintained themselves peacefully, quietly, firmly in the possession of Decatur for such a long course of time as by the law of nations, in analogy to the laws regulating private titles to land, would have ripened into a title.

I admit that in times of great military exigencies a military commander may seize private property for public use. When the just and proper defense of the country or the successful prosecution of the war with which he is charged requires it, he has the power to do it. It is a constitutional power. It is not the power of the robber, of lawless and resistless force. It is not the power of an unjust usurper trampling upon the constitution and laws of his country and making might right. No, Mr. President, it is a peaceful, ordinary, necessary power under the Constitution in its proper exercise; and that power alone, properly, peacefully, and constitutionally, was exercised when Miss Murphey's property was taken and so appropriated.

The gentlemen who oppose this claim live where the storm and fury of battle did not rage. Their homes were undisturbed by the shock of arms. Their women and children and men were never frightened by the roar of artillery. They occupied a country of such security and loyal feeling that no man dared be a rebel. They are the men who constitute the force that oppose this bill and all similar measures. But in the southwest and in Alabama it required principle and moral and physical courage, and love and devotion to the Union and the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws, to oppose the rebellion. Where all the great principles and forces of human decision and human action were operating to drive persons from their loyalty, from their true fealty to the country, loyalty was a thing to be prized. Do we not owe something to the persons who were faithful amid such fiery and terrible trial?

Here was a feeble and a fair woman with heroic soul, and with all a woman's devotion and truth, faithful to her country and its Government, who manifested a heroic adherence to her country amid the storm and the doubt of raging civil conflict. She showed her high courage, her high moral devotion to her country, and when her property was taken as a necessity of the public defense, when the safety and the life of the nation required it, should she not be compensated? It is by contributions of this sort in small amounts that, to use a cant phrase, the life of the nation was preserved. When this lady's property was taken in extremis in this great exigence, and to preserve the life of the nation, the position of the honorable Senator and his coadjutors in this ungracious resistance is that they who were perfectly secure are not bound to contribute to her indemnity; that although this storm of war may have swept from her all her small possessions, and left her and her orphan sister in poverty, penury, and want; when what they had: went like the widow's mite to the cause of saving the nation, there shall be no common average, that the cost shall not be met equally by the other people of the United States whose position was secure, who saw and heard the raging of the storm at a distance, and slept as quietly and securely as though there had been no storm; that this devoted woman must give her all to save the life of the nation, and that the Senator's constituency, so secure, and many of them so much more wealthy, shall give nothing. Is there any reason, humanity, justice, or law in that? None.

Mr. President, I have only adverted to a few objections to show why the laws of war do not and cannot apply to this and similar cases without utter confusion, without revolution, without the overthrow of our Government and its most valuable and sacred principles. Gentlemen commit a great error, and it is a very common one, when they choose to illustrate the powers of our Government by analogy to foreign Governments by the laws of nations. I will read a little from Mr. Madison in order to show the error and danger of such a course of interpretation and construction. Mr. Madison, in his recently published letters, says:

"Our governmental system is established by a compact, not between the Government of the United States and the State governments, but between the States as sovereign communities, stipulating with each other a surrender of certain portions of their respective authorities to be exercised by a common Government, and a reservation for their own exercise of all their other authorities."—Madison's Writings, vol. 3, p. 223.

Again:

"I view our political system also as you do, as a combination and modification of powers without a model, as emphatically entire, of which one remarkable feature is its annihilation of a power inherent in some branch of all other Governments, that of taxing exports. I wish, moreover, that you might be followed in the example of defining the terms used in argument, the only effectual precaution against fruitless and endless discussion. This logical precept is peculiarly essential in debating constitutional questions, to which, for want of more appropriate words, such are often applied as lead to error and confusion. Known words express known ideas; and new ideas, such as are presented by our novel and unique political system, must be expressed either by new words or by old words with new definitions."—Ibid., p. 436.

Again:

"It has been too much the case in expounding the Constitution of the United States that its meaning has been sought, not in its peculiar and unprecedented modifications of power, but by viewing it, some through the medium of a simple Government, others through that of a mere league of governments. It is neither the one nor the other, but essentially different from both. It must consequently be its own interpreter. No other Government can furnish a key to its character. Other Governments present an individual and indivisible sovereignty. The Constitution of the United States divides the sovereignty: the portion surrendered by the States composing the Federal sovereignty over specific subjects; the portions retained forming the sovereignty of each over the residuary subjects within its sphere. If sovereignty cannot be so divided the political system of the United States is a chimera, mocking the vain pretensions of human wisdom."—Ibid., vol. 4, p. 61.

"The Government of the United States, being a novelty and a compromise, had no technical terms appropriate to it, and old terms are to be used in new cases, explained by the context or the facts of the case."—Ibid., p. 209.

Now, sir, there are the fundamental principles of the Constitution laid down by Mr. Madison, who has generally been styled in history its father. I believe, myself, from having carefully read his writings, that he knew more of the Constitution—more of its true principles—than all the men who have ever written or spoken upon that instrument. One of the legitimate conclusions from these premises is, that when the Constitution establishes a principle or contains a provision in words, that principle or those words cannot be reached, they cannot be annulled, they cannot be qualified, they cannot be added to by a recurrence to the provisions and powers of any other Government. The Government of the United States, created by the Constitution, is entire entire; it is its own interpreter. Other Governments can furnish no authority of law or of reason in relation to its construction, except where its express principles are identical with those of the Government from which authority is sought to illustrate and enforce it.

Now, sir, I will apply these principles. Here is a provision of the Constitution of the United States in concise and the most explicit language, that private property shall not be taken for public use except upon just compensation. That is a provision peculiar to our Government. In that feature our Government is sui generis. In that feature our Government is a departure from all other systems of Government, so far as the fundamental law is concerned. There is no other Government in the world that has a written Constitution, a fundamental law enumerating and delegating its powers, dividing them out among the people, and securing certain great civil rights to every citizen, which has any such provision. Now, what is the position of Mr. Madison? This provision stands by itself; it stands in the fundamental law in times of revolution as a rock does in a stormy and tempestuous sea. The billows of faction, of military tyranny, of lawless violence, of cupidity, and rapine and plunder may beat against this great, deeply founded, and immovable principle, but it remains firm as an island-bound rock of the ocean.

That is the law which Senators have sworn to support. That is the law of this case. That is the law which ought to rule it. Wherever reason, learning, justice, and morals prevail, whether in deliberate assemblies or in courts or in popular assemblies or anywhere on the face of the earth, there is the law that will govern this and all similar cases. It is only passion and corruption that silence and stifle that law. The honorable Senator from California [Mr. Cole] yesterday quoted the maxim inter arma silent leges: in the midst of arms the laws are silent. I grant that where the rage of battle exists, where all civil authority is overthrown, in the very storm of battle, in its midst, from necessity that maxim prevails; but whenever the storm of battle has passed away the law, like the reed that is prostrated by the raging storm, rises to its natural position and resumes its wonted authority. That is exactly the state of things here. When Decatur was beleaguered, if it was beleaguered; when it was assailed, while the assault continued, before it was decided, as a matter of necessity the civil law was silenced; but so soon as that storm of battle passed away and the authorities, military or civil, of our country took peaceful, quiet possession of Decatur, or of any other portion of Alabama, in the country thus possessed by our arms and our authority, where the law could be peacefully administered, there was no longer any application of the maxim quoted from Cicero by the honorable Senator from California. That is the argument of usurpers, of tyrants, of demagogues, of mobs. I have heard it, and I give it the least possible operation. I certainly ascribe it to times and places inexorable, and it has no application whatever in this case.

But, Mr. President, suppose all the principles for which the honorable gentlemen who oppose this bill contend were correct, what, then, is the further law, according to their own system, which would prevail? I read the other day from the decision in the case of Brown vs. The United States, which has been received as authority by all the courts and commentators upon our Constitution and by all American publicists since as the true law. I will read the syllabus of that decision:

"British property found in the United States on land at the commencement of hostilities with Great Britain cannot be condemned as enemy's property without a legislative act authorizing its confiscation."
"The act of the Legislature declaring war is not such an act."

One of the principles of our Government declared in explicit language by the Supreme Court is that Congress has no power to declare war against a State; but if Congress had that power, if it had it under the law of nations in analogy to the relations existing between independent and sovereign and foreign States, what would be the effect? What was decided by the Supreme Court to be its effect in the case I have just cited? Congress declared war against Great Britain; property belonging to one of her subjects was found within the United States; during the progress of the war the law officers of the Government had that property libeled as enemy's property; the circuit court decided that the declaration of war of itself produced the confiscation and authorized the seizure of that property. That was the only question in the case. Upon that isolated question it was taken up from the judgment of Mr. Justice Story to the Supreme Court, and there the court, Mr. Justice Story alone dissenting, announced after full and solemn argument the principle which I have stated, that the mere declaration of war does not confiscate property; and until the property is confiscated by law it belongs to the alien enemy resident in the country. Congress might have added a clause of confiscation to the declaration of war; it might at any time pass another act declaring the confiscation of the property of the subjects of England found within the United States; but it passed no such law; and the judgment of the Mansfield of America, who did more service toward a correct exposition of the Constitution than any man whatever who ever lived except Mr. Madison, not having molded it, decided explicitly that the owner, although a public enemy and a foreigner resident in this country, was not disturbed in his possession or title to the property that was claimed in the libel, and could not be until Congress saw fit to enact and had enacted a special law to confiscate that property under particular or general terms.

Now, what would the principle here require? What would it have required of Congress? Let us in imagination to ourselves liken it to the invasion of Pennsylvania by the rebels, when the contest seemed to hang in equal scales. Suppose the honorable Senator from Michigan had then proposed, "we will pass a law according to such principles as are claimed in this debate to defeat this bill; we will declare that citizens of the southern States, independently of rebellion, without regard to their fidelity and support of the Constitution of their country, are public enemies; we will pass a law to confiscate all their property; we will pass a law that we will seize the persons of those who are residents in our lines and imprison them or eject them forcibly from the loyal States—a law that shall subject all their estates to forfeiture and confiscation?"

Why did not the honorable Senator in his devotion to this principle, in his deep detestation of the enemies of the country, in obedience to the laws which now, when the war is over, he says should govern this case—why did he not then introduce bills into Congress to produce these results? Why did not he introduce a bill to banish Andrew Johnson from the presidential chair? It would have saved the ridiculous farce of impeachment for mere difference in politics. Why did not he introduce a law to banish Mr. Justice Wayne from the Supreme bench? Why did he permit that illustrious and pure judge to hold his seat in that august tribunal for the purpose of constraining the Constitution and laws of the United States, the treaties which the United States formed with foreign nations, and the constitutions and statutes of all the States in the Union? Sir, if the honorable Senator had introduced a measure of that kind he would have been thought a raving madman; he would have made a step so mistaken and so preposterous as to have produced a tremendous countercurrent in public feeling and have brought the United States Government and its supporters to the feet of the rebels.

Why, sir, Jeffries, if he were in this country, would never have advocated such a principle as that. He was a stern judge, learned in the law, but his vicious and ferocious nature made him steep the ermine which he wore deep in the gore of the murdered victims of his judicial tyranny; and such a judgment as that would have been pronounced against such atrocious measures if they had been attempted to be introduced by the honorable Senator. Sir, I meet the honorable Senator upon his own premises, upon his own principles, on the question that the absence of an act of confiscation renders the title and possession of Sue Murphey to her property, and of every man, woman, and child in the United States in her condition, safe to her and to the respective owners. That is the law of the land, pronounced by the greatest judicial light that ever lived in it.

Why, Mr. President, if the honorable Senator's principle is capable of any application, this would be the utmost extent of its application: that only where a citizen of the United States joined the rebellion did he become the enemy of his country. A man or a woman true to the Constitution, true to the authority of the United States, true to the Union and laws, might have been passing like Shadrack, Meshach, and Abednego through the fiery furnace of rebellion, protected by the ægis of the Constitution, he or she would have passed as untouched by the fiery flames as those men who were protected by the great Jehovah. That is the protection which Sue Murphey and every person in her condition is entitled to from the Congress of the United States and from the courts. Crime is personal; punishment is personal. The Constitution of the United States knows no punishment of an innocent person, no forfeiture of life, of liberty, of property. Wherever the people who were in the southern States preserved their loyalty, their fidelity to their Government, they were as unstained by rebellion, as free from all its consequences, as the honorable Senator from Michigan, and with much more merit, because the temptation and forces that operated so terribly upon them and with such little results he was a perfect stranger to.

The honorable Senator, and those who assist him, cannot get away from the partisan illusion that these States became rebel and enemy's territory by State boundaries. If it would not be thought disrespectful to the honorable Senator's learning I would pronounce that to be unmitigated nonsense. It is refuted by the opinion of the Chief Justice in Mrs. Alexander's case. No, sir, Alabama never was enemy's country; no southern State ever was enemy's country; not one square inch of the United States ever was enemy's country. It was a country where insurrection and rebellion for a time overthrew the law; but when the insurrection was subdued and put down the law sprang up by the inherent principles of our Government and our Constitution. The Supreme Court recognized that doctrine in Mrs. Alexander's cotton case; and here in Decatur, if there ever was a time when the rebel flag and the rebel power swayed and ruled it was but a short interval; and when that rule was driven out the constitutional rule of the United States Government, with the panoply of the Constitution, with all the great rights of person, of property, of conscience, which that instrument secures to the peaceful and true citizen, immediately sprang up into full force and effect, proprio vigore.

That is the law as recognized by Chief Justice Marshall, and it is the law of justice. Unless that can prevail in this case, all else would be of the most revolting character, revolutionary, unjust, oppressive, confounding virtue and innocence with guilt and the deepest stains of vice.

Sir, there is no such confounding of principles and of morals in our Government. If your own principles—as they must necessarily apply under our Constitution and in subordination to it—are to have any application at all, before you can make these penalties attach to any individual you must show that that individual was actively a rebel. The honorable Senator from California said yesterday, in the beginning of his remarks, that if he conceded that there was any obligation, express or implied, in this case, which would require the United States to pay the claim, he would vote for the bill. Sir, I wish the case were before an enlightened and an impartial court upon that proposition.

Mr. COLEB. I desire to correct the Senator. My statement was that we should pay in cases where there was a contract, express or implied.

Mr. DAVIS. That was my understanding. Now, sir, when the Constitution declares that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation made, and the private property of a loyal citizen is thus taken, it is one of the strongest implied contracts that can be supposed. There is no intelligent court whatever in this land, or in any other land, that would not sustain it as an implied contract.

Mr. President, so far as my wishes and desires are involved, if gentlemen intend to repudiate a contract, be it so. It is nothing new in our history. Gentlemen of the majority have already repudiated a contract which they themselves had explicitly made two or three times with my State and with the other States which held slaves. They passed a solemn law providing that if we would permit our negroes to enlist in the armies of the United States, if we would encourage them, incite them to enlist in the armies, the Government would pay $300 for each of those who should voluntarily be enlisted. My State has a claim exceeding $10,000,000 against this Government. In obedience to this law and promise the Senate deliberately passed an appropriation bill directing $10,000,000 to be applied to the discharge of this claim; and after that had been concurred in, as I believe, by the House of Representatives, the gentlemen of the majority counter-marched; they counter-marched as they now have in the other House in relation to the tenure of civil office bill; they took the back track; they passed a law suspending the payment of money for property thus taken for public use for which Congress had two or three times pledged its word, its faith, its obligation.

The question may come in another form, as to what is equitable between the Government and the bondholders. To the bonds there were two parties: there was the Government and the purchaser of the bonds. It was a contract. The purchaser was not forced to take the bond; he did it voluntarily, and he paid less than half its value in gold for it in most cases. Under your constitutional power it was necessary for the existence and administration of the Government to seize private property for public use; you have done that, and the Constitution imposes the obligation upon you to pay for it, a supreme obligation, and you swore to support that Constitution and to comply with that obligation; and yet you come in now and offer to repudiate this pledge that comes up so fully to the principle and provision of the Constitution. Sir, when men denounce repudiation after giving a vote against this bill they ought to hold a thick veil before their faces. They ought to blush deeply in shame and remorse, if they have any conscience which will lead them to feel such sentiments as to bring forth blushes of shame and remorse. They ought to have a thick veil to hold up to protect them from public scorn for the violation of faith.

Mr. RICE. Mr. President, I have but a word to add to what has already been said on the question before the Senate. The position that I occupy in this case goes upon the presumption that Miss Sue Murphey was loyal to the Federal Government, that she owned this property, and that the property was taken by the Government for the use of the Army. If that be true, I hold that she is entitled to the pay for it the same, living at Decatur, that she would have been had she and the property been in the State of Pennsylvania or any State North. It is from that stand-point that I argue this question. Those points, all but one of them at any rate, seem to have been conceded by the Committee on Claims, and that is as to the nature of the claim. That, I believe, is not conceded. Some hold that it is for damages, and not for property appropriated for the Government use; but taking it to be property that was appropriated and used by the Government, I hold that she is to be paid for that property.

While I was up the other day I contended that from the commencement of the war to the present time every department of the Government had taken position in opposition to the law of nations on this subject of constructive enemies. I then made my remarks without having very thoroughly examined the subject. Since that time I have looked further into it, and I find that I am sustained in that proposition. I find that from the commencement of the war there was an exception made in favor of the loyal citizen, without regard to his local habitation, and that he was treated from time to time by every department of the Government as a friend, and not as an enemy of the Government.

What I rose now for was to call the attention of the Senate to what, I believe, is known as the confiscation act. By that act all the property of the officers, civil and military, of the confederate States of America was confiscated. There were five or six different classes of officers and men whose property was confiscated by the law of July 17, 1862. The sixth section of that act provides as follows. I will read it, as I can get the idea better in that way than by stating it:

"And be it further enacted, That if any person within any State or Territory of the United States, other than those named as aforesaid, after the passage of this act, being engaged in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States or aiding or abetting such rebellion, shall not, within sixty days after public warning and proclamation duly given and made by the President of the United States, cease to aid, countenance, and abet such rebellion and return to his allegiance to the United States, all the estate and property, moneys, stocks, and credits of such persons shall be liable to seizure as aforesaid; and it shall be the duty of the President to seize and use them as aforesaid, or the proceeds thereof."

That section applies to all the inhabitants of the South except those who were holding certain offices. It was intended for the people. It was intended to invite a return of the people to their allegiance, not by States, but individually. The President, in conformity to the requirements of that law, issued a proclamation which I wish to read in this connection. It is very short:

"In pursuance of the sixth section of the act of Congress entitled 'An act to suppress insurrection and to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' approved July 17, 1862, and which act, and the joint resolution explanatory thereof, are herewith published, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim to and warn all persons within the contemplation of said sixth section to cease participating in, aiding, countenancing, or abetting the existing rebellion, or any rebellion against the Government of the United States, and to return to their proper allegiance to the United States, on pain of the forfeitures and seizures as within and by said sixth section provided."

By that proclamation in 1862 sixty days were given to the people of the South individually—not collectively, not by States, not by counties, but individually—to return to their allegiance to the Government of the United States. Every person who after the expiration of those sixty days adhered to the Government of the United States by that proclamation is regarded as a friend and not an enemy of the Government. If the President of the United States, in obedience to an act of Congress, invites the return individually of those engaged in rebellion, or those who by construction are in rebellion, to their allegiance, and they do so and cast their fortunes with the Government upon that invitation, can the Government in good faith treat them any longer as enemies? Is not the effect of that to make them from that time forth not public enemies, but the friends of the Government with all the rights of the friends of the Government in any other portion of the country? That is the point to which I wished to call the attention of the Senate, that after the date of that proclamation, after the sixty days expired, every person who then adhered to the Government of the United States and continued to adhere to it to the close of the war was a friend by construction, in fact, and every way to the Government of the United States, and must be so treated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I regard the transaction of the taking of this lady's property as being in the nature of a forced loan, and the argument of the question to be precisely that which would apply to an acknowledged case of forced loan, made by our Government, or made by officers of our Government, upon a peaceful citizen of the United States. We have had, fortunately, little occasion in this country to consider questions of forced loans. They are common questions throughout Spanish America. My attention in former years was directed to them from the accident of my residence in one of the Spanish American republics. I bring, therefore, to this debate very strong feelings, as well as convictions, with reference to the real question involved in this bill. I bring feelings of strong opposition and antipathy to the pretenses upon which such loans are coerced by Governments from their citizens: and I have been able, so far as reasoning is concerned, to convince myself that I can vote for this bill without committing myself to a principle which will charge upon the Government an inconvenient and unreasonable amount of pecuniary obligation.

It is to be remembered throughout this debate that we have not here a case of an injury to a citizen resulting from some military operation merely. The injury was not an incident to the bombardment of a town. It was not an injury which resulted merely from the march of an army over the soil, over the possession of a citizen. It is not to be classed with any of those incidental consequences which follow from the carrying on of military operations in time of war. It is distinct from all those cases in the fact that here was a military order setting apart particular private property for military purposes, followed by an inquisition or finding by a military board of the taking of the particular property, and of its value; and more than that, a decision by the general in command in the particular district that this property ought to be paid for by the Government of the United States, and a recommendation by him that the engineer department should pay for it according to the award which had been found.

In the case which was before us from Virginia at the last session, the case of Mr. Segar, we refused to vote an appropriation of public money to the payment of his claim upon the report of a committee. I for one resisted the passage of the measure as it was first presented to us. I think it is not to be permitted that committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, upon ex parte affidavits, or upon statements of claimants made before them, or upon both these grounds, should make reports which, without any sanction or further showing, are to be adopted by Congress. In that case the bill was amended. Instead of paying the demand of Mr. Segar we referred the subject to the Court of Claims for investigation; and I think that ought to be considered a rule to us in all cases where we have no other guarantee for the amount of damages or the amount to be paid than the mere report of a committee. In the very nature of things it is impossible that our committees can examine cases of this kind and intelligently and fairly pass upon them, and give us the grounds upon which we can safely base votes appropriating the public money. For one I shall protest against throwing upon our committees the ascertainment of how much money is to be voted upon claims against the Government as a general rule, for only one side is heard, or can be heard, before them. The reasons which obtained in instituting the Court of Claims for the investigation of demands upon the Government were sound. Those reasons are of as much force at this moment as they were when that court was established. Therefore, in all ordinary cases, I should refuse to vote for the passage of bills of this character involving appropriations of money from the public Treasury upon the mere report of a committee.

The reasons for resisting such appropriations are most imperative. I said they were as strong now as they were when the Court of Claims was established. Sir, they are infinitely stronger. It is more necessary now than it was upon any former occasion in any former year that gentlemen in Congress should maintain a firm position against attempts to throw upon our committees the investigation and decision of these claim cases, where we have, and can have, in the nature of the case, no guarantee, except the report of a committee, that the amount of money which we vote is a just and proper sum, and that all the grounds upon which it is based are such as should commend themselves to our judgments.

But in the present case, as I have already stated, we have regular action by the military authorities in appropriating this property, an assessment by them at the time and upon the spot of the amount of injury inflicted, and an approval of the general in command of the district or place of that assessment, with a recommendation by him that the amount should be paid. Now, sir, upon precisely such grounds as those, so far as the investigation and allowance of Claims are concerned, millions and millions of money have been paid to private parties during the war and since the war, and it seems to me that this case when it came into the Senate, instead of being sent to the Committee on Claims, should have been sent to the Military Committee, and should have been reported upon by that committee as falling within rules, and belonging to a class of cases with which our military authorities were familiar during the war and since the war, and which have been paid, and properly paid, by the Government.

In the present case the amount of the demand is only $7,000, and I am satisfied that there was due investigation and a proper report from the military authorities who took this property as to the value of the property taken and the circumstances of its seizure. This case therefore can be distinguished from most of those claim cases which have been, and may hereafter be, presented for the consideration of the Government as growing out of the war. We shall be safe, so far as amount is concerned, and so far as the question of investigation is concerned, in passing this bill without referring it for investigation to some judicial tribunal, which in ordinary cases ought to be done.

Mr. President, I sympathize very much with the efforts of gentlemen in the Senate and elsewhere who devote themselves to the thankless task of protecting or attempting to protect the public treasury against unreasonable, unjust, or inconvenient demands; and to a great part of the debate, so far as it has been against this claim, I have listened with most respectful attention. But, sir, the true opposition to this bill, as it has been ably presented by several gentlemen, stands upon one ground, and upon one ground only. It is the ground of policy, dictated by convenience or necessity. If nations were able, if their means were such that they could extend complete justice to their own people, doubtless at the end of every war they would indemnify every human being loyal to them who had been injured during the war, whether by the operations of their own Government or by the hostile action of the enemy. The burdens and losses which fall upon individuals in particular cases would be distributed through the whole mass of the nation and would become a public and common charge. Upon grounds of abstract justice such a policy could be vindicated. It comports with humanity and with all those ideas of justice which civilization brings to man.

But, sir, nations and Governments know that this is impossible; that in the very nature of things they cannot extend to every person among their own people this abstract and complete justice and indemnity; and therefore they have adopted, and have acted upon, certain rules excluding from compensation all those claimants whose injuries were the act of the enemy and not the act of their own Government, and excluding, also, those injuries which were mere incidents and consequences of military operations by themselves; for it must be manifest to all who have examined this subject, that it is impossible that nations can enter upon this field of liberality and beneficence, without impoverishing themselves, depleting the public Treasury, and making the action of Government in collecting revenue and imposing burdens upon the people intolerable, perhaps leading to convulsion and to fundamental change. Therefore it is not done.

But, sir, these general considerations, I insist, do not apply to that class of cases which this bill illustrates, of which it is an example—cases where the authorities of Government themselves, by a deliberate act in a formal manner, have gone to the citizen and demanded from him as an individual a peculiar contribution to the public necessities; in other words, where they have made a forced loan or appropriation of his property. Government justly claims the right to demand of all its people contributions for the public necessities in time of war and in time of peace; but it acts by rules which secure equality of contribution. Hence one of the principles upon which your tax laws are based is the principle of equality. All men owning a particular form of property, engaged in a particular branch of industry, holding certain rights of accumulated wealth, are to contribute to the public necessities. They are to give a portion of their substance to the treasury of their common Government, so that it shall be nerved and armed to perform with efficiency its duties in time of war and in time of peace. But when the Government goes to a citizen or to a limited number of citizens and demands of them a contribution of their property, while the demand is not made upon the general mass of the community or class to which they belong, it does an act which can be justified upon no ground whatever except the ground of absolute necessity, the pressure of the moment, the exigency of the hour not admitting of delay or of postponement for the ordinary action of Government to interpose or have effect.

But, sir, when they do this, when they take this exceptional and extraordinary course, justified by necessity alone, what is an early, if not an immediate duty? It is that compensation shall be made to the individual; that at the earliest moment when the public beneficence and public justice can be brought to bear upon it, the individual who has been subjected to such peculiar strain shall be indemnified for the injury inflicted upon him. And, again, I hold that in this country of ours, under our free Constitution, with our system of equal laws, it would be monstrous to announce that the Government may seize the property of good citizens, men or women, in time of peace or in time of war, and appropriate it to its immediate necessities, and afterward deny them compensation or redress, and substitute for justice some vague declaration of general principles of public law obtaining between independent Powers, which were adopted for very different reasons from those which apply to debate upon this bill.

Now, sir, consider two or three other points, and with the statement of these I will conclude. Suppose you come down from the ground upon which I have placed this question to these points which have been hinted at but not fully expressed or argued in debate; suppose you announce, by a grave vote of the Congress of the United States, the doctrine that a military commander in time of war or of insurrection may seize upon the property of law-abiding citizens of the United States and apply it to military and Government purposes, and that afterward no obligation whatever shall rest upon the Government for his act or to relieve the citizens from its consequences; and what have you established? Why, sir, you have established in the first place the strongest possible inducement which can bear upon the ordinary mind against taking part with you against rebellion and against your enemies. Thus, in the present case if this lady, instead of being devoted to the Government of the United States, had contributed active assistance to the enemy her property would not have been liable to seizure or appropriation by that enemy; it would have been during the whole struggle safe and secure so far as they were concerned; and as regards us, it would have been safe and secure against the action of our Government, except in a remotely possible or exceptional case, because we never intended, although we announced something like it in an act of Congress, to confiscate all private property in the South. The chances were a hundred to one that she would be secure, so far as the title and enjoyment of her property were concerned, against the action of the United States.

But, on the other hand, assuming that she took part with our Government, then she was liable to the hostility of the authority and government under which she was for the time being placed, liable to lose all her property, and beside, (according to this monstrous doctrine,) if her own Government to which she was attached should rescue its flag from disgrace in her State, should resume its jurisdiction, should vindicate its just authority and power, any military commander with the flag of the Union over him could seize her property and apply it to public use and never in all the days of the future, no matter how the public wealth might be swollen and the public means be increased, could she ask for a dollar of indemnity or of compensation for the injury inflicted. Why, sir, this is to hold out an inducement, whenever rebellion breaks out or war exists, to our own citizens to go against us, to consult their private interests by opposing us; and it will be a strong and powerful inducement if it be held out and extended.

What more? We know that military commanders require to be placed under strong restraint in time of war, as much of restraint as is compatible with the active and successful prosecution of military operations; but what does this doctrine do? It puts the property of all the loyal people of the United States within an insurrectionary district completely at the mercy of any military commander who may be prosecuting war under the authority of our Government. If he seize it and appropriates it to the public use none can gainsay his power to do so, and there is no redress in the future.

If, in making these appropriations of property, the military officer chooses to consult his own personal feelings, his likes and dislikes, to take the property of A and let the property of B go unmolested because he loves the latter or hates the former, or because he has received a bribe to influence his conduct, there is no redress. Sir, I regard this doctrine as a doctrine of license to military commanders to do about what they please with the property of private citizens within insurrectionary districts. They are to escape censure and investigation for their conduct. No action can be brought against them, no responsibility fastened upon them; and your Government is not to respond either. They may do what they please, or about what they please, in taking private property, and there will be no remedy. Sir, I repeat this is a monstrous doctrine in my judgment, and it is as impolitic as it is unjust.

I have but little more to contribute to this debate. It has long been my conviction that this subject of war claims ought to be taken up and decided by the Government. I think it should have been taken up two or three years ago, immediately at the conclusion of the war; that we should have determined deliberately what kind of claims we would pay and what we would not pay, and should have proceeded at once to investigate those claims that were to be paid, to ascertain their amount and make provision for their payment. That has not been done, and gentlemen propose now, instead of taking up this subject and deciding it finally, that we shall put off the evil day, that we shall push these cases away from us; that we shall not subject our Treasury to any immediate strain, leaving them to come up again and again at one session after another until at some future time some decisions shall be reached. Sir, I am against this policy of delay. I am for prompt action; and it is my belief that if claims like the one now before us, and other claims which the Government in good faith and in good conscience ought to pay, are pushed away from you and postponed to some future time, the Government will eventually pay a great deal more than if the claims were now considered and decisions made upon them.

Mr. President, this talk about every person in the southern States being in contemplation of law a public enemy and to be treated as such in regard to all their private rights as they may have been connected with the late war, is, in my judgment, improper if not absurd. I believe there were two classes of persons connected with the late war who deserve peculiar credit for the course which they pursued, and to whom justice will be done by history. In the first place I refer to those persons in the southern States who maintained their allegiance to the Government of the United States. If there is any class of our citizens who deserve more of credit than another, and who will receive that credit from the pen of history, it is this class.

Doubtless among them there were many obnoxious as individuals; perhaps persons who trimmed a little between the two parties to the late war, or against whom some other objection appealing to our passions or to our just sense of patriotism may be made; but those true-hearted, sincere, earnest, and faithful patriots, who in the insurrectionary States stood by our cause during the war in good faith, who did not pollute themselves with the stain of this insurrection in any way whatever, deserve the gratitude of the American people now, and they will receive the plaudits of mankind in the future.

Sir, there was another class of persons who, though not involved in this bill, deserve a similar classification and similar credit and applause in the future, and that is that class of men in the northern and central States who, though politically opposed to the administration which held authority in our Government during the war, did their duty to their country; who performed all the obligations imposed upon them by our laws, and who went beyond that in contributing sincere and patriotic aid to the public cause, and who did this in spite of what they conceived to be errors in governmental policy and individual oppression and insult upon themselves. This class of our population, large in numbers, will receive, if not from the present time, from the men who shall come to consider our annals from a careful and judicial point of view, that credit and that honor which belong to them for their conduct and which justice imperatively demands.

Now, sir, belonging myself to one of these classes, I have risen upon this occasion to speak of an individual who belongs to the other class; and I say that if there be any just emotions left in our breasts, and if any sense of justice is to obtain in the legislation of Congress, this lady, whose father spent his life in the service of this Government and who left to her this little pittance of property which is involved in the present debate, will be taken kindly, generously, and handsomely to our confidence and favor by the passage of this bill; and we will say that they who were true to the Government in times of peril, in times of trial and suffering, shall not be forgotten when the conflict is passed and when peace and the blessings and prosperity of peace have again enabled us to meet the obligations of justice and to do our duty to the citizen as formerly we did it to the Government of our country.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, this discussion, so unexpectedly prolonged, has already brought us to see two things; first, the magnitude of the interests involved, and secondly, the simplicity of the principle which must determine our judgment. It is difficult to exaggerate the amount of claims which will be let loose to feed on the country if you recognize that now before us; nor can I imagine anything more authoritative than the principle which bars all these claims, except so far as Congress in its bounty chooses to recognize them.

By the report of the committee it appears that the house of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, together with all the other houses of the town, was destroyed, so that not a vestige remained, by order of the first in command at that place, on the 19th March, 1864, under instructions from General Sherman to make it a military post. It is also stated, that Miss Murphey was loyal. These are the important facts. Assuming the loyalty of the petitioner, which I have been led to doubt, the simple question is, whether the nation is bound to indemnify a citizen, domiciled in a rebel State, for property in that State, taken for the building of a fort by the United States against the rebels.

Here it is proper to observe three things; one concerning the petitioner, and two concerning the property taken: first, that the petitioner was domiciled in a rebel State, or, to use more technical language, in a State declared by public proclamation to be in rebellion; secondly, that the property was situated within the rebel State; and thirdly, that the property was taken under the necessities of war, and for the national defense. On these three several points there can be no question. They are facts which have not been denied in this debate. Thus far I confine myself to a statement of facts in order to prepare the way for the consideration of the legal consequences.

Bearing in mind these facts, several difficulties which have been presented during this debate disappear. For instance, a question was put by a learned Senator as to the validity of an imagined seizure of the property of the eminent Judge Wayne, situated in the District of Columbia. But it is obvious that the facts in the imagined case of the eminent judge are different from those in the case of Miss Sue Murphey: Judge Wayne, unlike the petitioner, was domiciled in a loyal part of the country, and his property, unlike that of the petitioner, was situated in a loyal part of the country. This difference between the two cases serves to illustrate the position of the petitioner. Because property situated in the District of Columbia and belonging to a loyal judge domiciled here, could not be taken, it by no means follows that property situated in a rebel State and belonging to a person domiciled there can enjoy the same immunity.

Behind the fact of domicile, and the fact that the property was situated in a rebel State, is that other fact, equally incontrovertible, that it was taken in the exigencies of war. The military order under which the taking occurred declares that "the necessities of the Army require the use of every building in Decatur," and the report of the committee says that General Sherman "had previously issued an order to fortify Decatur as a military post." I might quote more to illustrate this point; but I quote enough. It is plain and indisputable that the taking was under an exigency of war. To deny this is to annul the military order under which it was done, and also the report of the committee.

Three men once governed the mighty Roman world. Three facts govern the present case, with the power of a triumvirate. The domicile of the petitioner; the situation of the property; and the exigency of war. If I dwell on these three facts, it is because I am unwilling that either should drop out of sight; each is vital. Together they present a case which it is easy to decide, however painful may be the conclusion. And this brings me to the principle which I said at the beginning was so simple. Indeed, let the facts be admitted, and it is difficult to see how there can be any question in the present case. But the facts, as I have stated them, are indubitable.

On these facts two questions arise; first, as to the rule of international law applicable to property of persons domiciled in an enemy country, and secondly, as to the applicability of this rule to the present case. Of the rule there can be no question; its applicability is sustained by reason, and also by authority, from which there can be no appeal.

In stating and enforcing the rule I might array writers, precedents, and courts; but I content myself with a sentence from a writer, who, in stating the Laws of War, is perhaps the highest authority. I refer to the Dutch publicist of the preceding century, Bynkershoek, whose work is always quoted in the last resort on these questions. This great writer expresses himself as follows:

"It is a question whether our friends are to be considered as enemies, say, in a town which they occupy. For my part, I think that they must be considered as enemies." "They say that our friends, although they are among our enemies, yet are not hostilely inclined against us; for if they are there it is not from choice and the quo animo only is to be considered. But the thing does not depend only on the quo animo, but on the law, because their goods are with the enemy, and are of use to them for our destruction."—Bynkershoek Quaestiones Juris Publici, book I, chap. 3.

Nothing could be stronger in determining the liability from domicile. Its sweeping extent, under the exigency of war, is proclaimed by this same writer in words of peculiar weight:

"Since it is a condition of war that enemies may be deprived of all their rights, it is reasonable that everything of an enemy found among the enemy should change its owner and go to the treasury. If we follow the more right of war, even immovable property may be sold and its price carried into the treasury, as is the case with movable property."—Ibid., book I, chap. 7.

Here is an austere statement; but it was adopted by Mr. Jefferson as a fundamental principle in his elaborate letter to the British minister, vindicating the confiscation of the property of loyalists during the Revolution. (1 Jefferson's Works, vol. III, p. 369.) It was the corner-stone of his argument, as it has been since the corner-stone of judicial decisions. To cite texts and precedents in its support is superfluous. It must be accepted as the rule of International Law.

The rule, as succinctly stated, is simply this, that the property of persons domiciled in an enemy country is liable to seizure and capture without regard to the alleged friendly or loyal character of the owner.

Unquestionably there are limitations imposed by humanity which must not be transcended. A country must not be wasted or buildings destroyed unless under some commanding necessity. This great power must not be wantonly employed. Men must not become barbarians. But if, in the pursuit of the enemy or for purposes of defense, property must be destroyed, then by International Law it can be done. This is the rule. Vattel, while pleading justly and with persuasive examples for the preservation of works of art, such as temples, tombs, and structures of remarkable beauty, admits that even these may be sacrificed:

"If for carrying on the operations of a war or the works of a siege there be a necessity for destroying buildings of this nature, there is doubtless a right of so doing. The sovereign, or his general, makes no scruple when reduced to it by the necessity of war. The governor of a town evidently threatened with a siege, sets fire to the suburbs, that they may not be of use to the besiegers. Nobody offers to blame him who lays waste gardens, vineyards, or orchards, for pitching a camp or throwing up an intrenchment."—Vattel, book III, chap. 8, p. 138.

This same rule is recognized by Manning in his polished and humane work, less frequently quoted, but entitled always to great respect. This interesting writer expresses himself as follows:

"It is clearly a belligerent right to destroy the enemy's property as far as necessary in making fortifications." "Destruction of the enemy's property is justifiable as far as indispensable for the purposes of warfare, but no further."—Manning's Laws of Nations, p. 138.

With the limitations which I have tried to exhibit, the rule is beyond question in the relations between nations. Do you call it harsh?

Undoubtedly it is so. It is war, which from beginning to end is terrible harshness. Without the incidents sanctioned by this rule war would be changed, so that it would be no longer war. It was such individual calamities that Shakespeare had in mind when he spoke of the "purple testament of bleeding war," and it was such which entered into the vision of that other poet, when in words of remarkable beauty, he pictured by way of contrast the blessings of peace:

"Straight forward goes
The lightning's path, and straight the fearful path
Of the cannon ball. Direct it flies and rapid,
Shattering that it may reach and shattering what it reaches.

My soul the road, the human being travels,
That, on which blessing comes and goes, doth follow
The river's course, the valley's playful windings,
Curves round the cornfield and the hill of vines,
Honoring the holy bounds of property;
And thus secure, though late, leads to its end."

Coleridge's Wallenstein, part I., act 2.

It only remains now to show that this rule of International Law is applicable to the present case. Of course, our late war was not between two nations; therefore, it was not strictly international. But it was between the National Government on one side, and a rebellion, which had become "territorial" in character, with such form and body as to have belligerent rights on land. Mark the distinction, if you please; for I have always insisted and still insist, that complete belligerency on land does not imply belligerency on the ocean. As there is a dominion of the land, so there is a dominion of the ocean; and as there is a belligerency of the land, so there is also a belligerency of the ocean. Therefore, while denying to our rebels belligerent rights on the ocean I have no hesitation with regard to them on the land. But just in proportion as these are admitted, is the rule of International Law made applicable to the present case.

Against our rebels the nation had two sources of power and two arsenals of rights; one of these being the powers and rights of sovereign and the other the powers and rights of war; the former being determined by the Constitution; the latter by International Law. The nation might pursue a rebel as a traitor, or as a belligerent; but whether traitor or belligerent, he was always an enemy. Pursuing him in the courts as a traitor, he was justly entitled to all the delays and safeguards of the Constitution; but it was otherwise, if he was treated as a belligerent. Pursuing him in battle, driving him from point to point, dislodging him from fortresses, expelling him from towns, pushing him back from our advancing line, and then building fortifications against him; all this was war, and it was none the less war because the enemy was unhappily our own countryman. A new law supplied the rule for our conduct; not the Constitution, with its manifold provisions dear to the lover of liberty, including the solemn requirement that nobody shall be "deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law," and then again that other requirement, that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." All these were silent, while International Law prevailed. The rebellion had grown until it became a war, and as this war was among countrymen, it was a civil war. But the rule of conduct in a civil war is to be found in the law of nations.

I do not stop to quote the familiar views of publicists, especially of Vattel, to the effect, that, in a civil war, the two parties are to be treated as "two distinct powers." Suffice it to say, that such is the judgment of all the authorities on International Law. But I come directly to the decisions of our Supreme Court which recognize the rule of International Law as applicable to our civil war.

Tocqueville, with the intuition of genius, declared, in his remarkable work, that if a civil war should break out in the United States, it would be "territorial" in its character. Such was our civil war, and our Supreme Court have aptly described it as a "territorial civil war." In this "territorial" character I find a new reason for the application of International Law.

If this law is the rule in an ordinary civil war, where people are divided only by classes or opinions, there is stronger reason for it where the people are divided territorially also.

In the famous cases, known as the Prize Cases, (2 Black, R.—), the court expressly say:

"All persons residing within this territory, whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power, are in this context liable to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners."

Here is the rule of International Law applied directly to our civil war. In a later case, (2 Wallace R. —), the rule is applied with added emphasis and particularity:

"We must be governed by the principles of public law, so often announced from this bench as applicable alike to civil and international wars, that all the people in each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies."

Thus, according to our highest tribunal, the rule in civil war and international war is the same. By another decision of the court, this same rule continues in force, until the character of public enemy is removed by competent authority. On this point the court declares itself as follows, in the Alexander cotton case, (2 Wallace, R. —):

"All the people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by action of the Legislature and the Executive, or otherwise, the relation is thoroughly or permanently changed."

If the present case is to be settled by authority this is enough. Here is the Supreme Court solemnly recognizing the rule of International Law, even to the extent of embracing under its penalties all the people of the hostile community, without regard to their sentiments of loyalty. This is decisive. You cannot decree the national liability in the present case without reversing these decisions. You must declare that the rule of International Law is not applicable to our civil war. There is no ground for exception. You must reject the rule absolutely.

Do you say that its application is harsh? Of course it is. But again I say this is war; or rather it is rebellion, which has assumed the front of war. I do not make the rule. I have nothing to do with it. I take it as I find it, affirmed by great authorities of International Law, and reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Here I might stop; for the conclusion stands on reason and authority, each unanswerable; but I proceed further in order to relieve the case of all ambiguity. Of course, instances may be adduced where compensation has been made to sufferers from an army; but no case like the present. If we glance at these instances we shall see the wide difference.

1. The first instance is where property is taken by the nation, or its representative, within its own established jurisdiction. Of course, this is unlike that now before us. To cite it is only to perplex and mystify; not to instruct. Thus, a Senator has adduced well-known words from Vattel on the question "whether subjects should be indemnified for damages sustained in war," "when a field, a house, or garden, belonging to a private person is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a tower, rampart or any other piece of fortification." (Vattel, book IV., chap. 15, § 232.) But this authority is not applicable to the present case, where the claimant is not what Vattel calls a "subject," and the property was not within the established jurisdiction of the nation. It applies only to such cases as occurred during the war of 1812, where property was taken on the Canadian frontier or at New Orleans, for the erection of a fortress, or such a case as that which formed one of the military glories of the Count Rochambeau when at the head of the French forces in our country. The story is little known, and, therefore, I adduce it now, as I find it in the Memoirs of Segur; one of the brilliant officers who accompanied the expedition. (See Memoirs of Segur, vol. I, p. 375.)

way to embark for France. Their commander, fresh from the victory of Yorktown, was at the head of the columns, when a simple citizen approached, and tapping him slightly on the shoulder, said: "In the name of the law you are my prisoner." The glittering staff by which Count Rochambeau was surrounded were indignant; but the General-in-Chief restrained their impatience and smiling said to the American citizen: "Take me with you if you can." "No," replied the simple representative of the law, "I have done my duty, and your excellency may proceed on your march if you wish to set justice at defiance. Some of your soldiers have cut down trees and burnt them to light fires. The proprietor claims an indemnity, and has obtained a warrant against you, which I am here to execute." The Count, on hearing this explanation, which was translated to him by one of his staff, gave bail, and at once directed the settlement of the claim on equitable grounds. The American withdrew, and the French squadrons, which had been arrested by a simple constable, proceeded on their march. This interesting story, so honorable to our country and to the French commander, is disfigured by the end, showing extortion on the part of the claimant. A judgment by arbitration fixed the damages at $400, being less than the commander had at once offered, while the claimant demanded no less than $8,000.

Afterward, in the National Assembly of France, when this great country began to throb with republican life, this instance of submission to law was mentioned with pride. But though it cannot lose its place in history, it cannot furnish a precedent of international law. The trespass was within our own jurisdiction, in which respect it differed precisely from the case on which we are to vote. I adduce it now because it serves to illustrate vividly the line of law.

2. Another instance which I mention, in order to put aside, is where an army in a hostile country has carefully paid for all its supplies. Such conduct is exceptional. The general rule was expressed by Mr. Marey, during our war with Mexico, when he said that "an invading army had the unquestionable right to draw its supplies from the enemy without paying for them, and to require contributions for its support and make the enemy feel the weight of the war." (Halleck, International Laws, chap. 19.) But General Halleck, after quoting these words, says that "the resort to forced contributions for the support of our armies in a country like Mexico, under the particular circumstances of the war, would have been at least impolitic, if not unjust; and the American generals very properly declined to adopt, except to a very limited extent, the mode indicated." (Ibid.) It was, according to this learned authority, a question of policy and not of law.

The most remarkable instance of forbearance, under this head, was that of the Duke of Wellington, as he entered France with his victorious troops, fresh from the fields of Spain. He was peremptory that nothing should be taken without compensation. His order on this occasion will be found at length in Colonel Gurwood's collection of his dispatches, (vol. 11, p. 169.) His habit was to give receipts for supplies, and ready money was paid in the camp. The British historian dwells with pride on the conduct of the commander, and records the astonishment with which it was regarded by the peasantry, whether of Spain or of France, who found it so utterly at variance with the system by which the former had suffered and the latter had profited during the Peninsular campaigns, (Allison's History of Europe, vol. 12, p. 340.) The conduct of the Duke of Wellington cannot be too highly prized. It was more than a victory. I have always regarded it as the high-water mark of civilized war. But I am obliged to add, on this occasion, that it was politic also. In thus softening the rigors of war, he smoothed the way for his conquering army. In a dispatch to one of his generals, written in the spirit of the order, he says in very expressive language: "If we were five times stronger than we are, we could not venture to enter France, if we cannot prevent our soldiers from plundering." (Wellington's Dispatches, vol. 11, p. 171.) It was in a refined policy that this important order had its origin. Regarding it as a generous example for other commanders, and offering to it my homage, I must confess that, as a precedent, it is entirely inapplicable to the present case.

Putting aside these two several classes of cases, we are brought back to the original principle that there can be no title to damages for property situated in an enemy country and belonging to a person domiciled there when taken for the exigencies of war.

If the conclusion were doubtful I should deem it my duty to exhibit at length the costly consequences from an allowance of this claim. The small sum which you vote will be a precedent for millions. If you pay Miss Sue Murphy you must pay claimants whose name will be legion. Of course, if justice requires, let it be done even though the Treasury fail. But the mere possibility of such liabilities is a reason for caution on our part. We must consider the present case as if on its face it involved not merely a few thousands, but many millions. Pay it, and the country will not be bankrupt, but it will have an infinite draft upon its resources. If the occasion were not too grave for a jest, I would say of it as Mercutio said of his wound: "No; 'tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church-door; but 'tis enough."

If you would have a practical idea of the extent of these claims, be taught by the history of the British loyalists, who at the close of our Revolution, appealed to Parliament for compensation on account of their losses. The whole number of these claims was five thousand and seventy-two. The whole amount claimed was £8,026,045, or about thirty-eight million dollars, of which the commissioners allowed not quite half. Our claimants would be much more numerous, and the amount claimed vaster.

We may also learn from England something of the spirit in which such claimants should be treated. Even while providing for them Parliament refused to recognize any legal title on their part. What it did was in compassion, generosity, and bounty; not in satisfaction of a debt. Mr. Pitt in presenting the plan which was adopted expressly denied any right on grounds of "strict justice." Here are his words:

"The American loyalists could not call upon the House to make compensation for their losses as a matter of strict justice; but they most undoubtedly, have strong claims on their generosity and compassion. In the mode, therefore, that he should propose for finally adjusting their claims, he had laid down a principle with a view to mark this distinction.—Hansard's Parliamentary History, vol. 27, p. 610, June 3, 1788.

In the same spirit Mr. Burke said:

"Such a mode of compensating the claims of the loyalists would do the country the highest credit. It was a new and noble instance of national bounty and generosity."—Ibid., p. 614.

So far as this instance is an example to us, it is only an incentive to a kindly policy, which, after prudent inquiry, and full knowledge of the extent of these claims, shall make such reasonable allowance as humanity and patriotism may require. There must be an inquiry not only into this individual case, but into all possible cases, that may spring into being, so that when we act, it may be on the whole subject.

From the beginning of our national life Congress has been called to deal with claims for losses by war. Though new in form, the present case belongs to a long list, whose beginning is hidden in revolutionary history. The folio volume of State Papers now before me, entitled "Claims," attests the number and variety. Even amid the struggles of the war, as early as 1779, the Rev. Dr. Witherspoon was allowed $19,040 for repairs of the college at Princeton damaged by the troops. There was afterwards a similar allowance to the academy at Wilmington, in Delaware, and also to the college in Rhode Island. These latter were recommended by Mr. Hamilton while Secretary of the Treasury, as "affecting the interests of literature." On this account they were treated as exceptional. It will also be observed that they concerned claimants within our own jurisdiction. In 1797 Congress refused to make compensation for a house burnt at Charlestown, after the battle of Bunker Hill, by order of the American commander. The report says:

"As Government has not adopted a general rule to compensate individuals who have suffered in a similar manner, the committee are of opinion that the prayer of this petition cannot be granted."—State Papers—Claims, p. 159.

And, yet, in this case the property was destroyed for purposes of defense. In 1814 a claimant received compensation for a house at the end of Potomac bridge, which was blown up to prevent certain public stores from falling into the hands of the enemy (Ibid., p. 446;) and another claimant at Baltimore received compensation for rope-walks burnt in the defense of the city. (Ibid., p. 444.) The report of a committee in another case says that the course of Congress "seems to inculcate that indemnity is due to all those whose losses have arisen from the acts of our own Government, or those acting under its authority, while losses produced by the conduct of the enemy are to be classed among the unavoidable calamities of war." (Ibid., p. 462.) This is the most complete statement of the rule which I find.

After the battle of New Orleans, the question was presented repeatedly. In one case, a claim for "a quantity of fencing" used as fuel by troops of General Jackson was paid by Congress; so also was a claim for damages to a plantation "upon which public works for the defense of the country were erected;" also a claim for "an elegant and well-furnished house," which afforded shelter to the British army, and was, therefore, fired on with hot shot; also a claim for damage to a house and plantation on which a battery was erected by our troops. (Ibid., p. 521.) There was also another case, where Congress seems to have acted on a different principle. On the landing of the enemy near New Orleans, the levee was cut in order to annoy him. As a consequence the plantation of the claimant was inundated, and suffered damages estimated at $19,250. But the claim was rejected on the ground that "the injury was done in the necessary operations of war." (Ibid., p. 885.) Certainly this ground may be adopted in the present case, while it must not be forgotten that in all these latter cases the claimants were citizens within our own jurisdiction, whose property had been used against a foreign enemy.

The multiplicity of claims arising in the war of 1812 prompted an act of Congress in 1816 for "the payment of claims for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy." In this act it was, among other things, provided—

"That any person who has sustained damage by the destruction of his house or building by the enemy, while the same was used as a military deposit under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the amount of such damage."—Statutes-at-Large, vol. 3, p. 263.

Two years later it was found that in order to obtain the benefits of this act people, especially on the frontier of the State of New York, had not hesitated at "fraud, forgery, and perhaps perjury." (State Papers—Claims, p. 590.) On the recommendation of a committee of Congress the law was repealed, and it is now marked in our statutes as "obsolete." But it is not without its lesson. It shows what may be expected should any precedent be adopted by Congress which should quicken the claimants now dormant in the South. "It is the duty of a good Government to attend to the morals of the people as an affair of primary concern." So said the committee in 1818 recommending the repeal. But this warning is as applicable now as then.

Among the claimants of the present day, there are doubtless many of character and virtue. It is hard to vote against them. But I cannot be controlled on this occasion by my sympathies.

Everywhere and in every household there has been suffering which mortal power cannot measure. Sometimes it is borne in silence and solitude; sometimes it is manifest to all. In coming into this chamber and asking for compensation, it invites comparison with other instances. If your allowance is to be on account of merit, who will venture to say that this case is the most worthy? It is before us now for judgment. But there are others not now before us where the suffering has been greater, and where, I do not hesitate to say, the reward should be in proportion. This is an appeal for justice. Therefore, do I say, in the name of justice, wait!

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. WARNER. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he rises for the purpose of closing the debate?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. I should like to say a few words before the Senator does that.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I do not expect to shed any new light on the law of this question, nor do I expect or intend to speak at any length. I only desire to bring to the attention of the Senate two or three thoughts which occur to me in connection with this subject, and particularly in regard to the effect of the decision you are to pronounce upon the southern people.

First, in regard to the doctrine of constructive treason gentlemen quote high authorities here. They quote Vattel and Grotius and Puffendorf; and yet we all well know that the authority of these writers rests upon the fact that their opinions have commended themselves to the judgment and conscience of the world; and no one can deny our right to bring these authorities now to the bar of reason and of justice, and if they cannot stand that scrutiny their authority fails.

I cannot, standing in the position that I do as in part the representative of southern loyalists, allow to go uncontradicted any doctrine which classes those men as enemies; for, soldier as I am, in the presence of these southern loyalists, of these men who have been true to the flag of the country through all trials, I stand uncovered. I was a Union man where it was easy to be for the Union. I was brought up and borne forward into the ranks of my country's Army by an overwhelming power of public sentiment that I could not withstand and be a man.

But my friend from the South, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. ROBINSON,] for example, was a Union man where it was hard to be a Union man; was a Union man where it was a continued trial; a Union man where the whole sentiment of his State and society was against him; a Union man when there beat around him a storm of persecution and hate which it was hard to withstand. In his presence, before his devotion to the flag of his country and to the Union and to the territorial integrity of the Republic, I say I stand uncovered. His loyalty is superior to mine and to that of any Senator upon this floor who represents a northern constituency. And I feel that, standing here as the representative in part of men like him, men whom I know have been loyal through all these trials, I cannot allow to go uncontradicted and unchallenged a doctrine which makes those men the enemies of their country. Supported though it be by Vattel and Grotius and Puffendorf, I yet feel in my heart that it outrages every principle of justice and every principle of public policy upon which and upon which alone rest the authority of those authors and the decisions of the Supreme Court. There is no authority that may not be questioned; there is no decision that may not be appealed from; and if the authorities be, as I deny, against the payment of the claims of loyal citizens, then from those authorities and from those decisions I appeal to the sense of the justice in the public mind and to great considerations of public policy which should rule in these matters.

Mr. President, I would make a wide distinction in the character of these claims, between those which are for property destroyed in the course of the war and those for property taken regularly and officially by the officers of the Army for the use of the Army. I do not think that this is as strong a case as might have been presented; and I somewhat regret that the discussion should not have been upon a stronger case, such a case as this which I have in my mind, where commissary stores were taken by the order of the general commanding an army and were issued as rations to our soldiers, the owners of that property being at the time in our armies and holding a commission—there are many such cases; or a case like that which occurred in my own State, where a man whose loyalty cannot be questioned bought a draft upon a bank in New Orleans, and before it could be presented the money in bank was seized by the general commanding there, and paid into and is now in the United States Treasury.

But one word as to the amount of these claims. I do not think, from my observation of the South, that the amount of these claims will be very large. I think when we talk about thousands of millions, about an infinite draft upon the Treasury, we are talking at random. If there be honesty enough in courts, if there be honesty enough in Congress, if there be honesty enough in man to scan the testimony and learn who is loyal and who disloyal, the amount of the claims for which the Government will be liable under the rule I have stated, to loyal men will be comparatively small. I do not believe it will reach at the outside $50,000,000.

But, sir, I wish to say a word to the Senator from New Jersey, who told us that it is a poor return from the South, after we have saved them from the hands of the rebels, to come up here and ask our money; that we went down there upon their entreaty and rescued them from the hands of the rebels and brought them back again under the authority of the United States. Mr. President, I deny the doctrine. I deny that we went down there only for the purpose of rescuing these loyal men. I say that I went as a soldier, and your armies went, and you sent them, not alone to rescue the loyal people of the South, but because the existence of the Republic was endangered. Have gentlemen forgotten that rebel cannon were thundering within hearing of your Capitol, and that you yourselves sat here in danger? Then, say not that this war was prosecuted simply to relieve and rescue a few loyal men at the South, and that that being done they ought to be satisfied.

No, Mr. President; we prosecuted this war for the life of the nation, for the territorial integrity of the Republic; we prosecuted it in the interest of civilization and humanity, and not merely to rescue a few individuals; and we have no right to say to them that they make us a poor return when they come here and demand payment for injuries sustained. We were bound up with them in the great general result.

Now, even if it were true that these claims were of the magnitude which is alleged I say it is a nobler and a better ground for this great Republic to take to say, "Your claim is just and right and fair, but we cannot pay it;" but do not say to these southern loyalists, "You are our enemies, and therefore we will not pay you." Say to them with the honesty of an individual, "Your claim is just and right, but considerations of public policy and necessity compel us to say that we cannot pay it."

The same thing might have been said of our public debt. With a public debt of $4,000,000,000, as we had at the end of the war, including our bonded and floating debt, doubtful or timid men might have thought and said, "We cannot pay this; we must repudiate it." I say, Mr. President, and I feel that the country is able to and is willing to pay these men. All the country will ask of us is that we shall carefully scrutinize these claims, and see that none but loyal men are paid. I know the sentiment of the loyal masses of the North is that of the warmest sympathy for the loyal suffering Union men of the South, and that they are willing, while they are demanding here, and demanding rightfully, as I feel, that we shall discharge our existing indebtedness fairly and honorably, according to the letter and the spirit of the law; that we shall also deal justly and fairly and honorably with these southern claimants.

Remember what these Union men have suffered in the interest of the nation. In the interest of humanity and in the cause of right, and as an act in which I glory as much as any man, you stripped them of their property in slaves. At one blow, with one dash of the pen, you struck out of existence $4,000,000,000 worth of property; you perhaps took from the pocket of my friend on my right [Mr. ROBINSON] a hundred or more thousand dollars, and yet he does not complain. I rejoice that we did it. We did it in the interest of the nation, in the interest of right; and I cherish it as one of the proudest and noblest and best results of the war, and as almost compensating, if anything could compensate, for the glorious blood that was shed, that we are to-day a free people, and that men may everywhere now read the Declaration of Independence without shame and say that all men are created free and equal. But remember what we suffered, and be careful that you do not go a step further and say to them upon a technical doctrine of constructive treason they are our enemies and we will not pay them for the bread upon which we subsisted our soldiers while fighting this war.

Let me tell you, gentlemen, further, that the cause of reconstruction is an important and vital one. Look well at all the signs of the times, and let me admonish you, and particularly let me admonish my own party associates on this floor, that we have no friends to spare in the southern States; and let me tell you that if you deny the payment of a certain class of claims, which I have indicated, to loyal men, you will have, and the country and the flag and the Republic will have, less friends at the South than you have to-day. The well-being not only of the loyal men of those States, but of all the people of those States, the well-being of the white men, and the well-being of the millions of colored men whom we have liberated, and the well-being of the whole country in its entirety, hinges upon the success of our plan of reconstruction, and let me exhort you that you drive not from our ranks any of our friends, for we have none to spare.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I had not intended to participate in this debate at all. I listened with a good deal of interest to the argument upon the law that has been made for several days past; but, upon reflection, I am satisfied that we must take a much broader view of this question than the technical and narrow rules of law that have been read for our instruction. As the circumstances of this case are different from those of most of the cases upon which the rules have been founded, so we should rather look to the peculiar condition of our country in order to determine this question aright than look to the opinions of Vattel, Puffendorf, or Grotius.

So far as this claimant is concerned, I doubt very much whether she occupies that position which entitles her to recover. But as this case has been discussed in its general aspects, rather than with reference to her particular claims, I shall so consider it. In this case I will vote to recommit the bill.

But, Mr. President, let me take the case of a Union man in the South who has borne the heat and burden of this civil war, who has been persecuted, and who has sustained all those hardships that we knew were incident to the condition of a Union man in the South during the war. To say that we will treat him as a public enemy, and that we will refuse to pay him for his property deliberately taken by the Government, where under the same circumstances we would pay a man living in the North for his property taken by the Government, is revolting to the plainest principles of justice. I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine. Why, sir, I know that where a camp was organized in the State of Indiana, or Ohio, or Pennsylvania for the purpose of collecting and preparing troops, the owner of the property was indemnified by the Government for the damage done to it, or where forage and provisions were taken for the purpose of subsisting those troops the parties were indemnified for their property. To say that we will not pay a Union man in the South where his property has been taken under the same circumstances is revolting to the common principles of justice. I would throw to the winds all these technical rules by which the Union man of the South is to be treated as a public enemy, and by which we shall refuse to do him that justice which we would do to a man in the North of doubtful loyalty who was living in peace, comfort, and safety.

Mr. President, there was one authority referred to I believe by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILEY,] which perhaps might even cover all the cases; and I think that was in Vattel. He can correct me if I state it incorrectly. That authority was that even, for example in a loyal State or in a part of the country where the insurrection did not prevail, if the Government deliberately took property, as a house or a garden, to make a rampart or fortification, or if it took forage or subsistence deliberately, the Government was bound to make payment. According to that authority, as I understand it, when General Lee invaded the State of Pennsylvania and the army of General Meade was falling back, if, in the course of a march or a battle they ran over and destroyed the property of loyal men, that would be an act of war for which the Government would not be liable even in a loyal State.

And, sir, applying that principle to the southern States, where General Sherman on his march or in the course of a battle passed over and destroyed the property of Union men, the Government is not liable; but if General Meade in the course of expelling Lee deliberately seized property which became necessary for a fortification, or seized the forage and provisions of loyal men around him there, the parties would be paid, and under the same circumstances they should be paid in the South, always upon the condition that they are true and loyal men.

Then does not the rule reduce itself down simply to this, that wherever a loyal man in the North would be paid for his property which was deliberately appropriated by the Government, a loyal man in the South should be paid for his property deliberately appropriated by the Government; and where in the North a loyal man would not be paid for property destroyed in the course of a march or of a battle, so in the South a loyal man should not be paid for his property destroyed in the same way.

Can we afford to make any other rule on this subject? We might save some money by making another rule; but it would in the end be penny wise and pound foolish economy. After having expended some five thousand million dollars to keep the South in the Union, and after all our labors to build up a loyal party down there, shall we come here making shipwreck in the end by declaring upon the floor of the Senate that the loyal men whose hardships and sufferings we can never estimate shall be treated as public enemies, and that we will not pay them under the same circumstances under which we would pay a man for the taking of like property in the North. I can never consent to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will give way for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will give way, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1669) to authorize the issue of a national currency, and assure its stability and elasticity, lessen the interest on the public debt, and reduce the rate; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and I propose, with leave of the House, to give some reasons why it should be put on its passage.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall object if it is proposed to call the bill back, on the motion to reconsider, for the purpose of acting upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not propose to do that.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then, I have no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the currency of a highly commercial, expanding, industrious, and productive and free people, by which their values are measured and exchanged, should be uniform, sound, cheap, stable, and elastic.

Uniformity is that quality which gives the same value in every part thereof to the money of a country. This quality our present currency possesses in a sufficient degree of perfection.

Soundness may be defined as certainty that the currency is so secured that it can never fail of exchangeability for equal intrinsic values.

No American permits himself to doubt but that our legal tenders and national bank notes, secured by the pledge of public faith, guaranteed by all the resources and power of the country, are to be made good to the extent of value printed on their face. Our present currency, therefore, possesses the quality of soundness for all purposes of internal business and trade.

As to cheapness, all financial writers agree that a paper currency is the cheapest of all possible mediums of circulation, whether as regards the cost of its supply or of its wear and tear, or because of being non-producing capital while circulating from hand to hand. If gold and silver were used in its stead, or locked up as a basis for its redemption, they would be so much idle and dead capital doing duty as currency only, and the nation so using it would suffer the loss of interest on so much wasted capital. It is apparent that paper being but the sign or token of value yields no loss of interest upon itself as capital while used as currency.

While, therefore, in these particulars, our present currency is cheap enough, yet there is another sense in which that term is sometimes used in relation to money, but more properly to capital, which our present currency wholly fails to satisfy, and which it will be necessary to examine hereafter. I refer to the enormous price at which money or capital is now furnished to the consumer or user.

Stability of currency is, perhaps, the most important of all its attributes. It may be well enough defined as a quality of currency when used as a standard and measure of value which renders it unchangeable at all times as compared with itself. A measure of value should no more change than should the measures of length, quantity, or weight. It should be at all times one and the same. When all the property of a people is once adjusted to such a measure of value it is of comparatively little moment what that measure may be.

To illustrate: we have two measures of weight, the pound troy and the pound avoirdupois. We find no special inconvenience in their use, as the classes of objects submitted to their measure have remained unchanged for many years, and are bought and sold with regard to the difference between them, which also is invariable. So as to length. It is entirely unimportant whether we had adopted at first the imperial yard of Britain or the metre of France as a measure of length, provided we maintain it unchanged.

In the sense in which we have defined stability our present currency is greatly deficient. This arises from the fact that instead of being an unvarying standard of value of itself it is continually measured by another standard, to wit, gold, which is itself variable. Further, our currency is still more fluctuated by empirical attempts, either of legislation or administration, on the one hand to increase its value by bringing it nearer to gold, or on the other by combinations of brokers and bankers to reduce or enhance its value for the purposes of speculation and unjust gain.

This variability in our legal tenders is yet more largely enhanced because of the law which provides that they shall not be received for the duties imposed by the Government on imports, which annually amount to forty-five hundredths of the whole currency in circulation. To buy this sum in gold, therefore, causes our lawful money to be used in fact as an article of merchandise or commodity, to be exchanged for gold; which, for this purpose, is the only legal value in the country.

If, on the contrary, the legal tender had been made receivable in payment of all public dues; whether internal or external, and the amount issued fixed by law had remained unchanged, without power in the Secretary of the Treasury by hoarding, funding, or retiring it to change its volume, it would then have become a fixed, permanent, and stable value, to which all the property of the country would have assimilated itself—a standard not to be changed save by a law, of which change the whole country would have ample previous notice.

As its value as a standard would, in that case, have depended on the amount or value fixed by law, it is difficult to see why the currency might not be as unchangeable and unvarying a measure of the value of all property as the yard and pound the measure length and weight of all substances, are made invariable by legal enactment.

The term elasticity, as applied to currency, I will define as the power of contracting or expanding its volume, according to some known rule, to meet the necessities of its use in business, arising from its activity, its sluggishness, or from the needs of increased population.

At first thought this quality might seem opposed to the definition of stability which we have just given; but careful consideration will show that it is not so, as elasticity, as an attribute of currency, should pertain to it, not as a measure of value, but as a representative of active capital.

Stability is the fixedness of the volume of the currency as compared with property measured by it. Elasticity increases or lessens the volume determined by the necessities for its use. Elasticity is by no means synonymous with fluctuation, the latter being the increase or diminution of value of the currency at one time as compared with another; the former is the change of volume only as compared with itself.

To give an illustration from a sensible object: water is the most unstable, but the least elastic of substances.

A currency to meet this requirement of elasticity should have such capability of volume as to adapt itself to the highest needs of the internal business and commerce of the country, and at the same time such contractability as to adapt itself to the state of greatest depression without in either case affecting its soundness or stability or value. This quality of the currency is the element of its highest usefulness and safety as a circulating medium. In nothing is our present currency more deficient. It has a limit fixed by law, beyond which it cannot go, however great the exigencies of the business of the country may be; it contains within itself no power of contraction when not needed. Its volume must then remain still the same, seeking investment and profit in speculation and adventure forced by the selfishness of bankers and capitalists.

Again, not being capable of expansion the unprincipled and adventurous capitalist can calculate exactly how much currency he must lock up at the time when it is most needed to bring about financial crisis and distress, and thus involve in ruin the unsuspecting and honest merchant and dealer, who is made the victim of unlawful combinations which he can neither foresee nor control. A deplorable example of this as a practical fact has taken place within a few weeks under our eyes, by which the managers of an insolvent railroad, in connection with certain banks, who should have been regulators instead of regraters of the currency, contrived to sequester some thirty millions, and thus to bring about a stringency in the money market, and a consequent depression in the public securities of some five per cent. in a single day, out of which the conspirators might realize large profits. This process of robbing the community may now be repeated at pleasure. A system of currency which permits its guardians, the banks which issue it, to thus sport with the public credit and oppress the merchant, depress the public funds, and unsettle the business of the country, is clearly defective, and it is the duty of Congress at once to provide the remedy for that defect.

We see, therefore, that our currency is uniform, cheap, and sound enough, but that it lacks stability from fluctuation and elasticity to accommodate itself to the changes in the demands of business. Our financial system has another great and overshadowing defect, controlling the prosperity and development of the industry and resources of the country.

When called into use as a representative of capital our money is enormously dear! Three hundred and fifty-six millions of it, not now taking into account the fractional currency issued by the Government, was at once fundable into gold-bearing bonds at six per cent., untaxable by State and municipal authorities, and as is lately claimed—but without warrant of law—untaxable by the Government itself; so that whoever uses it in his business must pay an equivalent of ten or eleven per cent. for its use. The remainder—say $300,000,000—is issued to the banks by the Government, which pays some eighteen millions to them for the privilege of furnishing and indorsing it, cannot be obtained by the consumer from the banks short of nine to ten per cent. interest, reckoning exchange and commissions, that he who uses it must pay. Out of the great cities, and away from the sea-board, the average rate of interest is at least twelve per cent. In many sections of the southern States, on whose productions of the great staples, cotton and tobacco, as our chief exports to meet the balance of trade which is against us we must depend, money cannot be obtained at any price upon any security, and if got at all the average rates are twenty-four per cent. In view of this it will be seen the rate of interest becomes a matter of national importance as affecting our commercial relations with the other countries of the world. Cotton can be produced in Africa and India by the use of capital costing not more than four or at most five per cent. per annum, while the capital used in producing our cotton costs twenty-four per cent.; thus making a direct discrimination against our producer of twenty per cent., which of itself is to the foreigner a quite sufficient profit on the business.

The high rate of interest, which raises the value of all our productions, and the fixed limit to our currency, which is taken advantage of to produce financial panics and distress, imperatively demands the most prompt and efficient remedy. It can be neither denied nor delayed with safety or justice to our people as individuals, or to the country as a nation.

Impressed, as we are, with the necessity for some amendment of our financial system to effect these objects, still we must remember that every great or sudden change in the finances of the country has ever been, as it ever must be, the fruitful parent of panic, depression of business, paralysis of industry, and disaster. This consideration ought to circumscribe our action within somewhat narrow limits.

The only comprehensive remedy for the infelicities of our currency and financial condition that has been proposed, so far as I know, is that we should resume specie payments at once or at some period more or less remote, or, in other words, that we should return to the currency existing before the war, with the substitution only of the national for the State banks, i. e., that the Government should conduct its affairs by the receipt and payment of specie, and that the banks should have in their vaults one fourth of the amount of their circulation in gold, thus to be in condition to profess to pay specie for their bills when demanded, which should, therefore, be equal to gold. This, if it can be done, of course would bring every United States bond at once to par in gold, as well as all legal tenders, if the return to specie payment by the Government did not presuppose the substitution of gold for them. No one doubts that however soon or late such a change is effected it must cause the greatest depreciation of values in every species of property except debts held against the Government and individuals. Every bond and note would be appreciated, say thirty per cent.; all other property would be depreciated the same amount as compared with the present rate of valuation. Such an unsettling of values the world has never seen nor any nation endured. It would be equivalent to confiscation by legislative act of one third of the value of all the property in the country, excepting only that held by the creditor class.

The sole alleviation yet suggested is that such confiscation might be extended over a considerable period of time, say two years and a half, so that we might meanwhile be preparing ourselves for it; in other words, the Government ought to deprive the large majority of the middling and laboring class of its people of twelve per cent. annually of their values until one third of them are absorbed for the benefit of the small minority, who are owners of capital loaned at interest.

I will not insult the intelligence of the House by any argument upon the feasibility or practicability of these schemes. The better way to test them is to call attention to one or two of the methods by which it is proposed to accomplish so gigantic an undertaking. One says, "The way to resume specie payments is to resume." Suppose the physician should say to the sick man, "The way not to be sick is to be well," might not the patient ask his doctor how am I to get well? So, a few years ago, one may remember that the way proposed for the Union armies to get to Richmond was "On to Richmond;" and I trust I may not be considered as malicious in calling to mind that our armies found some difficulties in carrying out that suggestion, which resulted in such disaster that it was to be hoped those who blindly advocated it would never again dogmatize upon any subject the difficulties of which they neither appreciated or understood.

Another proposition, coming from a source we much respect, in some other of the branches of political science, is that we pass a law that specie payments shall be resumed on the 1st day of July next, but we are not told how the law is to be executed if passed. It was jocosely said many years ago that while an act of Parliament was omnipotent yet it could not make one's uncle his aunt. I fancy there would be an equally insuperable difficulty in compelling by act of Congress the payment at par of $700,000,000 of debts due on demand when there are but $100,000,000 capable of being used for that purpose.

Another learned, able, and intelligent gentleman, for whom we all entertain the highest regard, in a speech of great power, supports a bill embodying a plan for the relief of our financial difficulties which would be perfect were it not impossible. Stripped of the halo thrown around it by his logic and learning it proposes that the Government and banks shall return to specie payments by hoarding gold enough with which to do it. Granted; but how is the gold to be got? By borrowing simply. For although the Government may hoard the gold it receives for its duties on imports, yet that gold is in fact obtained by its merchants by borrowing it with Government notes at thirty-five per cent. discount. Whatever deficit of gold to carry out this scheme cannot be obtained by this process is to be borrowed on the Government notes for thirty years, sold at such rate of discount as foreign bankers may choose to impose. Now, specie payments, if they can be maintained, it will be admitted, will make all our public debt with its high rates of interest equal to par, if not at a premium in gold. The fault in the plan seems to be that we are not told how many greenbacks we must sell at thirty-five per cent. less on their face, and how many bonds we must negotiate at a like rate of discount on thirty years, to place ourselves in condition to pay both greenbacks and the bonds, which we thus sell at par. Differential calculus might work out the problem, but plain arithmetic is entirely inadequate to the task. Besides, as upon the best authorities there are only about fifteen hundred millions of specie currency in circulation in all the nations where our bonds have been or will be taken as an investment, or, indeed, in the civilized world, if we should succeed in locking up $350,000,000 of that, or twenty per cent. of the whole currency of the world, should we not make what in technical phrase is known as a "corner" on the rest of mankind, in comparison with which the late performance in that line of the Erie railroad and New York bankers would sink into merited insignificance?

Again, suppose by this ingenious and novel process of borrowing we were to return to a "state of solvency"—to use the phrase of those who insist that our "legal tenders are depreciated, failed paper," because not paid on demand—i. e., return to specie payments, to the state of currency before the war, could that condition be maintained?

It will be remembered that before the war the Government received all its dues and paid all its expenditures in gold and silver only, amounting to from sixty to seventy millions yearly received and paid out, and there were in the country, as is estimated, some two hundred to two hundred and fifty millions of specie, exclusive of what was hoarded, although in 1860 there were but $87,000,000 in the banks.

It cannot have been forgotten that such use by the Government of specie to do its business say one dollar of four caused great financial distress whenever any considerable accumulation of it lingered in the vaults of the Treasury, inasmuch that the Secretary of the Treasury, on more than one occasion, was implored by the merchants to set free the gold even by buying United States bonds at thirty-two per cent. premium, which was done to avert a financial crisis. The learned gentleman upon whose scheme I am commenting, if I understand him, proposes that there shall be introduced into the country for circulation some three hundred and fifty million dollars, which we may believe to be a large estimate, exclusive of the amount hoarded, which, for obvious reasons, is and will for a long time be greater than before the war.

The receipts and expenditures of the Government must now be annually say $350,000,000, or a sum quite equal to all the gold assumed by this plan to be in the country. If before the war the use by the Government of one dollar in four, while it left the other three for banking purposes, unsettled the business of the country, what must be the effect of the use by the Government under this plan of every dollar of specie in circulation, leaving nothing for commercial purposes, if we have a currency based on specie?

Time will not permit to me the further examination of this and cognate plans for the resumption of specie payments. If a return to specie values is the only remedy for our financial evils, then there is but one plan, in my judgment, by which it can be accomplished: we must wait and grow to it. By the industry and economy of our people; by the development of our resources; by the enterprise of our business; by the extension of our commerce; by the production of the precious metals; by reducing importations, the only method by which we can keep specie at home; by retrenchment of the expenses of government, both State and national; by the relinquishment of all hazardous and doubtful enterprises, we must accumulate sufficient surplus wealth to bring back the $600,000,000 of our national bonds held abroad, to which may be added an equal like amount of State and railroad bonds also held there, and thus stop the annual drain of more than seventy millions of bullion now sent abroad year by year to meet interest alone. When this is done we may with wisdom return to specie values and specie payments without serious financial disaster and commercial ruin. But this time will come only when gold and silver from the plenitude of its production will have depreciated to our values, not we appreciate them to the present value of gold and silver.

But while we wait the effect of our increase of wealth in bringing us back to specie values what shall be done to remedy the financial evils from which we suffer so much, that even now a commercial panic is upon us? The questions still return to us, what meanwhile shall be the currency of the country? what can we do by legislation to insure its stability and give it elasticity? and how can we reduce the rate of interest on the public debt and thereby lessen commercial interest, so that we can cheapen our productions to compete with those of other nations of the world?

Appreciating the magnitude of these topics, fully aware of the difficulties that bristle around the adjustment of such questions, with great diffidence as to the full comprehension of the details to be cared for, with entire deference to the matured opinions of others, and after careful thought and full examination of the subject, I have ventured to offer in the bill I have submitted to the House several propositions which I believe if adopted will mitigate the evils of our present financial system, and which I humbly hope may have at least merit enough to evoke discussion, so that the wisdom of Congress may speedily mature some legislation to meet the wants of the country, and to assure if not to heighten that degree of prosperity in business which the people have enjoyed since the passage of the legal-tender act of 1862. In attempting this I have avoided everything which shall give shock to our present finances or materially change the values of property or the relation of debtor and creditor, whether public or private.

Observing that the amount of legal-tender notes now issued by the Government—say $350,000,000—are very nearly equal the amount of the taxes and duties to be necessarily collected by the Government for a series of years to meet our expenditures—at least the variation is not material for my purpose—I propose that, retiring the present legal tenders without shock to the business of the country in the manner hereafter to be explained, the Government shall issue an amount equal to its taxes, say $350,000,000, of certificates of value, of convenient denominations, not less than one dollar, which shall be lawful money and legal tender for all debts, public and private, which, by the law creating them are not made payable in coin, and shall be receivable for all taxes, duties, and imposts of every kind whatsoever, to be reissued at pleasure under the conditions hereafter set forth or in payment of the debts of the United States, and which shall be received for all public loans made to the United States.

It will be convenient here to explain the changes suggested in this certificate of value from the present legal tender note. I propose that the paper money of the Government shall be a "certificate," with appropriate vignettes, to prevent counterfeiting, in form like bank notes, stating its value only upon its face, with the provisions of law creating it, instead of as now a note promising to pay a certain sum at the Treasury of the United States, which is by law to be paid only in another like it, so that no stupid person hereafter, in order to depreciate the currency and have an opportunity to declare it "failed paper," shall present it for payment to the Treasurer of the United States expecting it to be redeemed in any other manner than is provided by law and stated upon its face.

In providing for the certificate to be legal tender I have avoided undertaking, by legislative action here and now, to decide the mooted question whether the principal of a portion of the public debt is payable in coin; not desiring to complicate this, which should be a measure of instant relief, with the discussions incident to that very grave legal question which may hereafter have to be decided either at this bar or in the courts or in the higher and more potent tribunal of the judgment of the whole people.

The most important and only other difference will be seen to be that this money is to be received for all taxes, whether collected from external commerce or internal revenue. It is difficult to see why the Government ever should have established two kinds of lawful money in which to do its own business, and, stranger still, exact one only for its citizens.

I assume that the change will at once bring this lawful money of the United States nearer to gold—will very considerably diminish, if not entirely prevent, the operations of the gold room and the nefarious pursuits of the gold gamblers. Gold and silver will then take place as commodities to be exchanged abroad according to their value in weight as merchandise. Indeed, a moment's reflection will convince any man that this has always been the case when gold is used in kind for the payment of foreign debts.

One principal argument in favor of a currency based on specie has been that our currency ought to be of the same value as the currency of the world—as the phrase is—in order that we may be able to pay our foreign debts in our own coin. But in fact our coin is never used abroad at the value we have stamped upon it or for payment of foreign debts. It is always reduced to the value of so many ounces of gold of a certain fineness and exported as bullion, a convenient and safe form of merchandise against which bills of exchange may be drawn, and that value fluctuates very materially in different countries. As an example, take Japan, where the standard of value is silver. In 1857 our consul at Simoda, Mr. Townsend Harris, informs us that gold is only as one to three and a half in silver, while with us it holds by law, as a part of our specie standard, the rate of about fifteen and a half to one; i. e., in Japan three and a half ounces of silver would purchase an ounce of gold, while in America it took fifteen and a half ounces of silver to purchase an ounce of gold. How, then, can it be said that gold is the standard of value of the world, when in one country which absorbs large amounts of our specie it stood depreciated in comparison with silver at our standard at nearly eighty per cent., and it is not the standard of value in either of the great commercial countries save England?

The experiment of issuing money based on taxes alone as its redeemable value has been tried to a small extent at an early day in this country. Soon after the Revolution North Carolina, having no money, for the convenience of her people issued, say, $500,000 in State notes, receivable in payment of taxes. Of course, she could not make them legal tender. Although her annual taxes were only about two hundred thousand dollars, these notes at once took their place at par value, and became, in practice, convertible into gold, although no man could demand gold for them. They thus remained until they were gradually worn out or absorbed, no new issue being authorized, and the bills of the State banks took their place.

I assume that these "certificates of value" as a circulating medium will at once take their place as nearly equivalent to gold. They will be redeemed in the payment of taxes every year. I do not mean to say that each individual piece of paper would be redeemed, but an equal amount. There is an objection to them as compared with the present greenback, and that is the Government would have to procure gold to meet its interest and pay the difference between the gold and the certificate.

But let us here reflect a moment that the gold now paid for customs duty is obtained by the merchant borrowing it upon the Government's note at thirty-five per cent. premium, and it is very clear that the difference between the proposed certificate of value or greenback and gold would in the future be much less. I have also endeavored to find a compensation for this apparent loss to the Government, as will be hereafter seen.

It may further be objected that making these certificates receivable for duties inasmuch as they may be below the par of gold would to that extent reduce the percentage of the tariff. This, if an evil, would soon cure itself. Any considerable increase of importation by calling for more currency to pay the duties would enhance the price of that currency, and therefore bring it quite up to gold. Besides, as the act is to go into operation at a future day, if it were supposed there would be any appreciable difference between the value of the certificate and gold, then importations would be held up until that time, when the sudden influx would materially enhance the value of the currency to pay duties.

My next proposition is to take from the national banks all power to issue notes to circulate as money, leaving them as they are now, banks of deposit, loans, and discounts, but not of issue; of course to be relieved from all taxes on circulation.

It is evident that the $350,000,000 of "certificates of value" above proposed circulating as money would not be a sufficient amount of currency for the business purposes of the country; therefore I propose to throw open the present privilege which the banks have of obtaining money from the Government to every man or association of men who can furnish precisely the same security that the banks now do for the money so received from the Government. Or, in other words, that every owner of a Government bond paying six per cent. interest in coin may go to any public depository in the United States, and, lodging it there as security, shall receive "certificates of value," i. e., greenbacks, to the amount of ninety per cent. of the par thereof, to be at his pleasure reconverted into his bond at any time after thirty days, he paying to the Treasurer for the money he receives at the rate of .0365 interest per annum in coin thereon until he returns a like amount of certificates to the Treasury, when he shall receive back his bond. Assuming $1,750,000,000 of six per cent. bonds to be outstanding, and every one should be presented to the Treasury and currency demanded, would give $1,575,000,000, being ninety per cent. thereof, as a possible amount of currency to be issued.

The first objection striking the mind is that this amount would make the currency by far too redundant. Would or could the business of the country need so much? It can safely be admitted that so much currency would not be needed and in practice no such sum would or could be taken. A large portion of these bonds are held abroad and would not return until more valuable here than there. Another large portion held for purposes of investment would not be tempted to be taken therefrom without a very large difference between the rate of commercial interest and the rate at which it was obtained from the Government; the controlling limitation in practice on the issue of this currency would be the rate of interest paid to the Government for it. The owners of this species of capital will never pledge it to the Government or anybody else for money at 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on ninety per cent. of its value unless that money could be safely and profitably invested as productive capital, or, in other words, unless the business needs of the country actually required it for its profitable and successful prosecution. In that case, and for that purpose, it is difficult to say why the currency should not be extended so as to meet the necessities of the people when duly restrained by the rate of interest paid and the kind of security required for the issue of Government money. The rate of interest would act as a certain "regulator" or governor of the amount of the circulating medium.

As a currency it would be secured to the holder by the pledge of all the taxes, customs, wealth, resources, and power of the country. As capital loaned it would be secured to the Government by its own bonds at ten per cent. below their par value and 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest on the difference. How could it differ in value, except being better, from the bills of the national banks? It has greater ultimate security, because all customs duties are pledged for its redemption in addition to the internal taxes. It would have—what the bank currency has not—elasticity. Whenever it were wanted and the rate of interest rose, it would be taken from the Treasury and the interest would accrue to the Government; whenever it was not profitable for use to the holder, the rate of interest falling to 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in gold, he would return his money and receive his bond, and the Government would have lost nothing by the transaction, but gained the intervening interest.

Assuming that over and above the \$350,000,000 which it is provided the Government shall issue for its own purposes that an average of \$500,000,000 should be found necessary to be used as money, then the Government would save \$18,250,000 in gold interest upon that sum, or, in other words, be paying but 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on \$500,000,000 of its six per cent. indebtedness; that, added to the \$18,000,000 now paid to the banks as interest on the bonds they have deposited for their circulation, say \$300,000,000, and six per cent. on the \$100,000,000 now lying idle in the Treasury, the saving would be \$42,000,000 in coin, instead of the loss by the present manner in which Government issues its money to the banks. If it be assumed that the Government, under the proposed system, would have to pay a margin between its certificates and gold to pay interest on its gold-bearing bonds, there surely in this saving would be found means to make up the difference.

If it be said that this currency will fluctuate, it is answered its only element of fluctuation in value is the fact that it may be increased or decreased by act of legislation. But we all know how difficult it is to get acts of legislation passed to alter the currency even when the country is suffering very grave evils.

It is not to be assumed that the Representatives of the people in both Houses of Congress will unite with the Executive wantonly and causelessly in legislation that shall unsettle the values and currency of the country.

I am quite willing to compare the fluctuations from legislation or the stability of this currency with the stability of a currency actually and exactly convertible into gold under the best circumstances in which such currency has ever been administered for a highly commercial and manufacturing people. I trust no one will complain if I compare this currency with the notes of the Bank of England.

By the act of 1844, known as Sir Robert Peel's act, the Bank of England was put upon an exact specie basis, i. e., no more notes could be issued than she had gold in her vaults to pay, in addition to those notes which experience had shown in no case of panic had or would come in for redemption; for beyond that amount the bank was not allowed to issue a single note without a corresponding amount of gold in the vaults of her issue department, and that amount of gold was to be kept there by altering her rate of discount, which it was claimed would, as it was raised or lowered, contract or expand the business of the kingdom.

In thirteen years and five months following that act, from September 7, 1844, to February 4, 1858, the bank altered her rate of discount fifty-six times, during which time she quintupled her rate of interest, raising it from two to ten per cent. on the best sixty-day commercial bills. Between April, 1857, and January, 1858, eleven changes in the bank rate of interest occurred; and in the year 1858 her rate of interest whiffled, like the weathercock, five times in five weeks. In addition she suspended specie payments twice, to wit, October 28, 1847, and November 9, 1857, and issued inconvertible bank paper, by order of the Government, to save all the merchants and banks of the kingdom from financial ruin, after many of them had failed; and in November, 1856, she refused all discounts at any price, even upon Government securities.

I shall hereafter trace a few of the more important fluctuations of the currency in our own country when upon a gold basis, and the memory of every business man will furnish many more. I will compare the probable, nay, the possible, fluctuations in value of the currency here proposed because of legislative interference with the fluctuations of our own currency when on a specie basis, or the changes in the value of money in England, where the bullionists must look for the most perfect exemplar of that system of convertible paper, back to the miseries which it causes they would fain force their country, and I am content, as the country will be content, to bide the comparison.

If objection is brought against the currency here proposed, either that it will encourage speculation or bring disaster upon mercantile business, or that the rate of interest paid for bank accommodation will be increased to the borrower in comparison with paper money always convertible into gold, I will not trust any argument of my own in reply, but will produce incontrovertible authority which no bullionist dare dispute.

The suspension of the Bank of England in 1847 caused a solemn parliamentary investigation of the workings of the financial system of paper convertible into gold at pleasure, which was most elaborately, impartially, and intelligently conducted; and I point to the conclusions of the report of the committee to the House of Lords as a truthful portrait of the effect upon business and the country of a currency based on and instantly convertible into specie. Hear the statement of the facts developed before that committee:

"It is true that to those who may have expected that the 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 32, [Peel's act requiring the bank to keep specie to redeem her bills,] would effectually prevent recurrence of cycles of commercial excitement and depression, the contrast between the years 1845 and 1847 must produce grievous disappointment."

"To those who anticipated that the act would put a check on improvident speculation the disappointment cannot be less, if reliance is to be placed (as the committee are confident it may) on the statement of the governor of the bank and of other witnesses, that 'speculations were never carried to such an enormous extent as in 1846 and the beginning of 1847.'"

"If the act were relied on as a security against violent fluctuations in the value of money, the fallaciousness of such anticipation is conclusively proved by the fact that while the difference between the highest and lowest rate of discount was in the calamitous years of 1837 and 1839 but two and a quarter to two and three quarters per cent. the difference in 1847 rose to six and three quarters."

"If it was contemplated that the number and the extent of commercial failures would have been lessened the deplorable narrative of the governor of the bank, recording the failure of thirty-three houses, comparatively in large business, in London alone, to the amount of $40,645,000, is a conclusive reply."

"If the power of obtaining banking accommodation on moderate terms were considered to be promoted by the act of 1844 it cannot be said that this important object has been attained, since it appears in evidence that in 1847, in addition to an interest of nine or ten per cent., a commission was also frequently paid, raising the charge to ten, twenty, or thirty per cent., according to the time which bills had to run."

Does anybody believe that an inconvertible paper currency can do worse than that? "If so, for him have I offended."

Having given the distinctive features of the proposed system of currency I need not employ the time of the House long upon the details of its execution.

To prevent shock to business in making the change I would require the collectors of taxes on the first day of every month, beginning the 1st day of July next, to return to the public depositories all the legal-tender notes received by them in previous months, which should never be reissued, but instead, "certificates of value," as proposed, in payment of the expenses of the Government. I would also require a like return of all the bank notes collected for taxes, and they should continue to be received so long as any were offered, up to the 1st day of January next, at which time their receipt for internal taxes should cease. And upon all the amounts of bank notes so returned five per cent. interest shall be charged to the banks by the Government, and retained from the interest payable on the bonds by which the bills are secured until they are redeemed by the banks in certificates of value or in the three per cent. certificates issued in pursuance of the act of March 8, 1867, and the act of July 3, 1868, when an aliquot proportion of such securities shall be returned to the banks redeeming them.

After the 1st day of January the Comptroller of the Currency should charge to the banks five per cent. interest on all the bills heretofore issued to them not redeemed in the manner before stated, or, at the option of the bank, furnish instead thereof the certificates of value, based on bonds pledged for their redemption, the lawful money of the Government. If the national banks should not choose to receive money in lieu of their notes, then upon their return to the Treasury, the bonds lodged with the Comptroller of the Currency to secure them are to be returned.

Experience has shown that fractional currency, of which there is, say, $30,000,000 in circulation, is used only to the extent of the convenience of the people. It is now the practice of all countries wherein it is made of metal is so to debase it in comparison with the standard of value as to prevent it being hoarded, exported, or used in the arts.

I would propose, therefore, for convenience of handling, that the fractional currency, instead of paper, should be in denominations of ten cents and upwards, composed of tokens in the form of silver coins heretofore used, made of silver alloyed with some of the metals to such extent as to prevent hoarding or exportation or use in the arts as metals, which should be issued in redemption of the fractional currency now in use, which paper fractional currency, after the 1st day of January next, should not be received except at the Treasury for exchange for the tokens herein described.

On and after July 1 the Government should be prepared to issue money in exchange for bonds as before set forth, and to allow the money so exchanged to be reinvested into the same bonds at the pleasure of the holder.

One, and a not inconsiderable advantage of this gradual but entire change in the currency of the country, certainly enough to pay all possible expense attending it, is the detection and extinguishment of all the forgeries of bank notes and fractional currency now in circulation. It is well known there is now, practically, no redemption of national bank bills. They are rarely or never returned to the bank that issued them for redemption, so that no test can be applied as to genuineness. Large amounts of them having been issued on the same dies and vignettes, counterfeiting has been greatly facilitated—specially is this true of the fractional currency of the United States, which never comes back to the Treasury in any considerable quantities. But the exchange herein proposed would at once entirely extinguish the counterfeiters now in circulation and render all the preparations, plates, and vignettes of the forgers useless and valueless.

It has been assumed that the reason our securities abroad do not command par is because we have not resumed specie payments here. In one sense that may be true; for if we resume specie payments, and were capable of continuing that resumption, our bonds would command par, because they would at once be sent home for sale, commanding a higher price here than abroad. But it seems to me that the defect of the reasoning which makes our bonds abroad less than par because our currency here is at a discount, is that it mistakes the effect for the cause, whereas the truth is that our currency is at a discount, because our bonds are selling at 74 in London to 78 in Frankfort. The price of the bonds abroad controls our currency here in its relation to gold, not our currency here controls the price of our bonds abroad. The mistake is in supposing that the worth of $2,000,000,000 of our interest-bearing debt is controlled by the price of $350,000,000 of non-interest-bearing notes.

That the premium on gold is wholly controlled by the price of our bonds abroad was conclusively demonstrated at the breaking out of the war between Prussia and Austria. Our bonds fell in Europe ten per cent. Mr. McCulloch, adopting the theory that the premium on gold could be kept down by increasing the supply of gold in the market here, irrespective of the fall of our bonds in Europe, sold some thirty millions of gold in the vain endeavor to prevent a rise in the premium on gold corresponding to the fall of our bonds. He did this at a loss of some three millions to the Treasury, but in vain. The premium on gold went up until it came in exact equilibrium with the price of our bonds and then stopped, wholly irrespective of the sales of the Secretary. He might as well have attempted to raise the water in the nose of a tea-kettle above that in the kettle itself, by pouring water into the nose, as to have sold his gold for the purpose he did. Again, when the war suddenly ended, and the price of our bonds went up in Europe, the premium on gold fell here in the precise ratio.

It is frequently asked why are our six per cent. bonds in Europe at 74 and 78 when the three per cent. consols of England are at 92? And the answer usually given by the bullionists is, because of the doubt as to the credit of the Government or its intention or ability to pay the national debt. I respectfully submit that is not the true answer. It would be more nearly correct to say because those who invest in our bonds are afraid they will be paid. If it were doubt of our ability to pay let me ask why are our gold certificates, which are only promises of the Government to pay gold on demand, at par or a small premium at home as well as abroad? Why does not the supposed doubt of the good faith and ability of the Government affect them? Clearly because they are wanted day by day as a convenient medium for the transportation of gold, and the supply is not in excess of the demand. Bearing on this same topic, will gentlemen tell me why the five-twenty bonds should be selling at 74 in London and at 78 in Frankfort? Is it not for the same reason that in England their three per cent. consols are at 92 while our six per cent. bonds are at 74.

It is an axiom in political economy that supply and demand always regulate price. Now, our bonds and the English consols are not taken by business men for business purposes or as mediums of exchange, but for investment by those who desire to put away a surety for their families, or as trustees of charities or associations, or in annuity offices. Now, the debt of England, although considerably exceeding ours, has been contracted through a long series of years, in not very large comparative amounts, and has been absorbed for the purposes of investment gradually until the supply does not much exceed the demand for investment. We all know the natural preference an Englishman would have for the securities of his own country over a security at a distance of which he knows but little. We have seen individuals loan money on mortgage at five per cent. in our eastern cities for a series of years, when by sending their money to the West they might loan it at ten per cent. on equally substantial real estate there. This will explain why the Englishman should prefer his own securities to ours, even at a higher rate of interest, as a matter of investment, but it does not explain why our bonds should be at Frankfort 78 which are at only 74 in London. Why does not the Englishman send his bonds to Frankfort and realize the difference?

In a period of three years we threw $2,500,000,000 of securities, payable at short dates, to be taken up as investments, upon the markets of the world, and although undoubtedly they were largely affected when first issued by the doubt of our success in putting down the rebellion, so that they sold for forty to fifty cents on the dollar, yet after the rebellion was fully subdued they rose nearly to their present figure, and have remained quite stationary ever since. But if I am right, that they are only wanted in Germany as in England for the purpose of investment, then it will be seen at once that we have issued for investment a supply of bonds largely in excess of the demand for that purpose. And as Germany has no national securities bearing the same relation to its people as the consols to the Englishman, they are more sought after on the Continent for investment, and therefore are higher in price, and our bonds being held in England for investment only! the holders do not care to change their investments for the sake of the difference in price. I do not doubt if there were no more of our bonds to be procured at any price abroad that those already there would immediately appreciate to par if not to a premium; or, in other words, the supply and demand would regulate the price.

There is a curious illustration of this in the fact that a small amount of Massachusetts gold-bearing five per cent. bonds was subscribed for by a single house in London at 95, while the bonds of the United States, which had not only the security of Massachusetts, but all the rest of the United States behind them, at six per cent., were selling at 74. The Massachusetts bonds were all taken for a single investment, and the supply did not exceed the demand.

There is another element which very largely affects the price of our bonds, and that is the option the United States reserves to pay its bonds within five years. Length of time for an investment is a large element of value. The very theory of the British consols is that they are never to be paid, and nobody dreams that they ever will be.

The United States has once paid all her indebtedness in gold to the great disgust of the holders; for at the moment when we paid it at par it was worth 120 in the market. Those investing in our securities fear this may happen again.

I assume, therefore, that any adjustment of our currency for our own convenience will not materially affect the worth of our bonds abroad. But if I knew how, consistently with honor and national faith to our creditors, to prevent every one of our bonds going abroad, and to bring all back that have gone, as I view the deplorable fact of the absorption of our exports to pay $70,000,000 of interest, I would vote at once for that proposition.

England carries her debt with ease and with prosperity as a nation, because it is almost wholly due to her own citizens, and all income derived from it remains at home, while we, by sending our debt abroad, are in a degree suffering the evils which have impoverished Ireland—absenteeism, or the owners of her lands withdrawing all their incomes from her to be spent away. So that if any one objects to the plan of currency I propose, that it will have the tendency to keep our bonds at home, or to bring home those that are abroad, for the purpose of being used as security to be pledged to the Government for currency, to him I answer, that is exactly what I hope may be done.

Let no man say that I desire to establish or perpetuate a depreciated currency. I think I have proposed a currency as valuable as gold and for all purposes of a circulating medium better than gold, every dollar of which I doubt not will soon be made equal to gold; but what I do desire is that the currency shall not be redeemable in gold and silver, so that any man, because he has a dollar of it, can call for so many grains of gold which must be paid him, and the currency canceled to that extent, but with his currency he must buy his gold as he does his wheat where it can be had in open market. In other words, the value of the currency of this country, its volume, its stability, the values of all property of the country shall no longer be, at the mercy of the panics, the caprice, the speculations, or the needs of the bankers of Europe or the traders of Asia.

But I hear the bullionists exclaim, "Our money must be the same as the money of the world." "We cannot have a different standard of value from other nations." I would as soon or sooner have our Government, our laws, our institutions, the same as the institutions of the rest of the world. We have divested our Government of every trait of the despotisms, every attribute of the monarchies, and every vestige of the slaveries of the Old World save one, and that is, the all-controlling and all-absorbing power by which masses of the people of all nations of the earth have ever been enslaved—coined money.

More than three thousand years ago the despots of the world, as the most potent method to enrich themselves and their favorites and perpetuate their tyranny, hit upon the device of impressing their "image and superscription" or other peculiar stamp upon pieces of two of the metals, not the most intrinsically useful or the most beautiful, but the most scarce and difficult of attainment by the masses of the people, thus arbitrarily making a measure of value and equivalent for which the property of their subjects must be exchanged. Because of their capabilities of being so converted into equivalents of power the so-called precious metals were eagerly sought after by all men in such degree that they came falsely to be deemed to have a special intrinsic value in themselves equal to the effigy of value stamped upon them.

In the earliest republics, when Governments were established by the people for themselves, the worth and potency of these metals were antagonized as attributes of despotism. They stamped value upon the more common and equally useful metals generally distributed among the people, to be used by them as instruments of exchange and trade.

Thus in early Greece the effigy of the ox, the most valuable of the people's possessions, was impressed upon pieces of brass or iron, intrinsically of little value, but thus made the equivalent of comparatively considerable wealth.

So Rome, for more than five centuries used the effigy of the sheep, pecus, impressed upon copper for currency, thereby giving the name pecunia, by which money and wealth were afterward designated throughout the world. It is now admitted by all political economists that finely engraved printing upon paper, fixing its value, is the best of all possible substitutes for coined money for circulation, and cheaper as a currency for a people than gold itself. It may therefore be safely assumed that had the arts and education been sufficiently advanced in the Grecian and Roman republics, the money of the people would have been such paper instead of the ponderous and inconvenient metals.

Not until the people of these free Commonwealths became deteriorated by vices and luxury, yielding their liberties to tyrants either by choice or usurpation, did gold and silver, the ever-ready adjuncts of despotic power in all its forms and degrees, obtain place and scope to do their appropriate and never-failing work, the enslavement of the labor of the masses. It will be remembered when the victorious Gaul threw his sheathed sword into the scale as the counterpoise of Rome's degradation the beam was not balanced by her money, but by the ornaments and trinkets of the richer of her citizens, for she had neither gold nor silver coins for more than a century.

Twelve centuries afterward, when the feudal system dividing Europe, just then emerging from the dark ages, into many small principalities and powers had given petty princes, dukes, barons, and bishops control of the liberties of the impoverished people, each claimed as his prerogative the right to fix his value to pieces of gold and silver, and the same to change and debase at his will, by which his serfs must measure their possessions and pay tribute to him of all they had. Coined gold and silver has ever been the handmaid of despotism; the prop of monarchical power; the supporter of thrones; the upholder of nobilities and priesthoods; the engine by which the privileges and pretensions of aristocrats have always been sustained in trampling down the rights, devouring the substance, and absorbing the unrequited labors of the masses. Through all time the possession of money has given power to the few to enslave the labor of the many for the benefit of princes and nobles, and its use has been the badge of servitude of all peoples to some king or tyrant. To deny this at one time was treason.

When the chief priests would fain have taken hold of the words of our Lord "that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor," they asked, "Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar, or no? But he perceived their craftiness and said, why tempt ye me? Show me a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? They answered, Cæsar's. And he said unto them, render, therefore, unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. And they marvelled at his answer."

Our patriot fathers, founding a Government for themselves on this continent, carefully eliminated from its framework every attribute of monarchy and aristocracy, the divine right of kings, patents of nobility, the succession of primogeniture, the law of entail, the fealty of one man to another—every of the devices of kingcraft and oppression with which the people are governed by a class—all, save one: they retained, whether for good or evil, the precious metals stamped with the king's image as the standard by which to measure the property and industry of the new Republic. "It was a grievous fault," and grievously have their children answered it. Great, wise, and good men, we marvel that they foresaw so much, "but they saw not all things."

It is easy to understand what determined them in this exceptional adoption of gold and silver, which were the monarchical standards of value. They had just emerged from a war for liberty, during which they had seen their paper substitute for that standard rendered quite valueless and useless because made convertible and redeemable in gold and silver only, where gold and silver were impossible to be had.

But the Continental currency wanted everything which could give it value; issued by an aggregation, or conglomeration rather, of States just struggling for existence, trying an experiment of government in a new world which many of their best people more than doubted would be a failure and end in anarchy, without checks and guards against overissues, coarsely engraved, easy of forgery, degraded by counterfeits by their enemies so that it was difficult to distinguish the genuine from the false, the only wonder is that such a currency was ever capable of the good service it did do in the war of independence.

An infant country without commerce or article of export, save almost only that which was drawn from the sea, without manufactures, with every necessary, not to say luxury, of life to buy from abroad, save what came from the soil, the founders of the Republic might well have been tempted to bring themselves into connection with the great family of nations by adopting as their money the precious metals by which all the commercial intercourse of the nations of the earth was then carried on, and to bear with such endurance as they might the loss, disaster, and ruin which the adoption of such standard of value at once entailed upon the country, for it is worthy of observation that its hardship was so great as to produce a serious rebellion and outbreak against the law in what was then as now the most cultivated, intelligent, and law-abiding portion of the country.

That the evils attending the inauguration of their monetary system did not cause our fathers to change their financial policy, with its probable consequences, is not a subject of surprise; for they had in almost present contemplation the action of revolutionary France in issuing the assignats and mandats as a substitute for gold and silver—a currency which almost at once became valueless, although nominally based upon what is reckoned among men the most desirable of possessions, the lands of the nation.

The failure of the French experiment of the issue of a substitute for money not convertible into gold and silver has ever since been faithfully held up by every one who affirms that it is the law of necessity that gold and silver only can be money as an example and warning against attempting to violate that law and as conclusive evidence of the impossibility of so doing without the inevitable depreciation and ruin of the finances of any people, however stable, rich, powerful, united, productive, and prosperous, who should venture to have a currency of their own. Nor is it strange that such was the impression that the French financial system made upon the founders of our Republic.

Contemporaries can never weigh and determine, with such precision as those who come after them may do, the causes and effects of governmental action. They might not then see as we now see that there were two causes which made the assignats and mandats of the French revolution inevitably valueless. Both these forms of security were the evidence to the holder of a right to buy or locate upon a portion of the confiscated lands of the nobles and priests of France, called by the revolutionary Government the national domain.

Now, the value of land to him who claims the ownership is composed of two essential elements: productiveness and title. Without title the productive value of land is of little worth to the claimant, and the assurance of title was exactly what the assignat did not make to the holder.

Beside, looking back upon that time as we do, it is difficult to see why the French paper money was not then as valuable as any other human possession in France, whether gold, silver, land, limb, or life; neither was worth an hour's purchase. The legislator of to-day was the criminal of to-morrow, the judge of to-day was the culprit of to-morrow; the knife of the guillotine, like the rain of Heaven, fell alike on the just and the unjust. He who at one moment held the assignat claiming title to the confiscated estates, at the next had his own estate confiscated with the assignats which he held.

Candidly and justly considered, can it be said that a fair argument ought to be drawn to maintain that all substitutes for gold and silver as money must be worthless because the paper money of France was valueless when and where nothing was valuable?

Every student of the history of our country will remember that while at the organization of the Government the standard of value by law was gold and silver, yet in fact the currency of the United States was even at that period engraved paper, presumed to be, but not convertible at the will of the holder into coin; for one of the acts of the First Congress was to establish a Bank of the United States, to issue what was inconvertible currency, which, as the act reads, "will be productive of considerable advantages to trade and industry in general." The stock was to be paid for one fourth in gold and three fourths in the public debt of the United States, thus making at that early day the public debt a basis of three fourths, at least, of the currency of the United States.

Another provision which will claim our attention is that the notes were to be receivable in all payments to the United States, thus giving its bills one value that legal tenders now have. Another provision of the bank charter deserving attention was, that while it might issue $10,000,000 of circulation it was to go into operation when $400,000, or four per cent. only in gold and silver of its capital, had been paid in, thus establishing the principle that its notes, all which circulated as money, were never to be in fact convertible into gold and silver. But for its operations the United States were not to be liable save to the extent of one fifth of the stock to which it might become a subscriber.

Notwithstanding the prohibition of the Constitution, that no State should emit bills of credit, the necessities of the people for money to develop the resources of the country was so controlling that every State established banks to issue bills which should circulate as money, the basis of which was nominally one fourth in specie.

In the light in which we now view this establishment of State banks they would seem clearly within the inhibition of the Constitution, because it is only a patent evasion to allow the States to establish bodies corporate, in which they were sometimes part owners, to do that which the Constitution prohibited the States themselves from doing. Thus the creature might and did do what was prohibited to the creator. Nor is it surprising that this State legislation, when examined by the courts, was held within the Constitution, because the common convenience and necessity of the whole people always have, as they always will, set aside the written provisions of constitutional law. "Salus populi suprema est lex" has ever been, as it ever should be, the interpreter and complement of the Constitution.

The United States Bank failing to be rechartered in 1811, the country remained without any uniform currency, although gold and silver were standards of value, until 1817, when another Bank of the United States went into operation, with a much enlarged capital, for a period of twenty years, and then wound up its affairs, a renewal of its charter having failed by the veto of President Jackson.

It will not be useful further to advert to the history of the financial legislation of the country save to call attention to the independent Treasury act of July 4, 1840, among the provisions of which it was enacted that all debts due to or from the United States were to be paid and collected in gold and silver, so that the currency in which the Government transacted its business was truly specie. This practice, as is well known, obtained until the war of the rebellion and the legal-tender act of February 25, 1862. But during all this time the currency of the people was paper issued by the banks, secured by various legislative devices. The actual security for the immediate redemption of this paper was nominally one fourth gold and silver coin, supposed to be in the banks, but in fact about one sixth, and its only other worth the actual value of the notes and bills of their customers, discounted by the banks on longer or shorter time, or what is technically known as the "bank portfolio."

As all these bank notes circulated as money purporting to be redeemable in specie on demand, as well as the deposits, which much exceeded the circulation, and as the banks held in fact so small a percentage in coin, it is obvious that these promises could not be so redeemed, so that whenever the exigencies of the business of the country or of the world called for any large sum the banks either refused to pay specie or by contracting their circulation so diminished the money of the country as to bring themselves within a limit at which their circulation, being a necessity to the people, would not come in for redemption.

It will be readily seen that the fluctuations in the amount and value of the currency caused by the banks being obliged to contract to meet every considerable demand in specie were destructive to all stability in business enterprises, if not to commercial integrity itself, since once in every ten years, and a large part of the time much oftener, the banks were obliged to refuse to redeem their notes in specie, and from the necessity of the case were supported in so doing by legal enactment. No mercantile sagacity in business, no forethought or prudence in investment, no integrity of purpose, and no solidity of capital in the merchant or conductor of business enterprises, public or private, under such a financial system of pretended convertibility could or did prevent commercial failures and ruin. Every few years panics ensued, and whole classes of solvent, prudent, enterprising men were involved in ruin from causes which it was impossible for them to foresee or control.

The whole property of the country, the scanty provisions for the widow and orphan, the stocks in otherwise prosperous enterprises, the shares of public works carried on to develop the industry and wealth of the country, each and all alike, at uncertain and irregular periods, fluctuated in price quite one half.

If this condition of things had been dependent upon the habits of our people, upon the productiveness or non-productiveness of our industries, the profitability or unprofitableness of our commerce or business enterprises, or upon the current enactment of our Legislatures, either State or national, one or all, perhaps some remedy might have been found or method of alleviation proposed. But none of these had any effect to hasten or retard these fluctuations of commercial values. The fault was inherent in our financial system, which was, and while based on money convertible into specie must continue to be, but an exaggerated offshoot of the financial systems of Europe, subject to the changes, the needs, the wars, famines, and distresses of other countries. It was in no sense an American system, nor in any of its parts adapted to the institutions of a free, enterprising, and independent people. Many and various were the expedients resorted to by the General Government to remedy this chronic vacillation of money to the destruction of the business interests of the country. But all in vain.

In the endeavor to do this the United States, as we have seen, at first chartered a bank, became a subscriber to its stock, and received and paid out its bills as money for a period of twenty years. Still the erratic but inevitable periods of commercial distress came round. Again it refused to have anything to do with a bank, and left money to the natural laws of trade for five years, from 1811 to 1817. Still financial disaster came and went in turn like the vibrations of the pendulum, but wanting their regularity. In 1816 the Government again tried the experiment of making an unfluctuating convertible currency, by chartering a bank of more than three times the capital of the old one as a regulator of the currency. Still the oscillation went on more pronounced and ruinous than ever. The years of 1827-28 will ever be memorable in the history of the country for the wholesale destruction of fortunes and commercial values. The bank charter expired in 1836 by its own limitation, and the Government again divorced itself from all connection with the finances of the country, to leave a supposed convertible paper to do its own work uncontrolled save by its own laws, but the financial distresses and convulsions of 1837 caused all previous ones for the time to be forgotten.

In the endeavor to find some relief by legislation political parties were broken up, and the election of 1840 turned upon the distresses in business of the country alone, but change of administration brought no relief. The Government established its own affairs firmly on a specie basis in 1840, holding aloof from any interference with the finances of the country, hoping to give them stability by the regularity and steadiness of its receipts and payments in coin, although sometimes issuing Treasury notes like exchequer bills, or buying in its own bonds in order to deplete its depositories of gold as a measure of relief to commerce and business. Still the periodical visitations of commercial disaster and ruin continued, and the distress and revulsions of 1847 and 1857 quite paralleled those of 1827 and 1837 as periods of financial disaster.

It will not be useful further to trace the commercial history of the country, but with the experience of seventy years of such fluctuations of value, of commercial ruin and distress, from which the country cannot be shielded either by the sagacity of its financiers and merchants, the wisdom of its legislators, or the industry and enterprise of its citizens, let me pause here and ask, the country being now, partially at least, emancipated from a financial system producing such results, is it desirable voluntarily to return to it? Specially, ought we to force ruin and distress upon the majority of the people in order so to do?

It is needless for me to add that amid all these convulsions and revulsions of the business of the country and its currency and the destruction of its values, the losses fell at last, as they ever must fall, upon the laboring masses. Bread riots were not unfrequent; productive industry was paralyzed; the work shops and mills were closed, leaving labor unemployed and unpaid; its value thus lost never is regained by a rise in prices or a return to prosperity; for it is the peculiarity of labor, says an eminent economist, "that it is the only commodity that perishes at the instant of production, and if not then put to use is lost forever."

Such are the results experience, during the lifetime of the Government, shows have always followed the attempt to conduct the business of the country upon specie payments, or, in other words, with a circulating medium supposed to be always convertible, but which never can be converted into gold and silver.

Let us now examine and see if we may know why, with our currency upon a supposed basis of convertibility, experience has shown that it is apparently beyond human power to regulate or control, or sustain the business or finances of the country. Is it not because in adopting the specie measure of value and instrument of exchange we have bound our business and finances hand and foot to the monarchs and bankers of Europe? We have adopted their standard of value, which they control at their will, for their purposes and for their prosperity and not for ours. Whenever from caprice or malignity or panic or war or attempt to unsettle or restore the balance of power among the Governments of Europe they have seen fit to lower or raise their price for gold, then our currency based thereon, but expanded as four to one, feels the shock in quadruple proportion. Nay, more, having silver and gold both as standards of value whenever the caprice of some Indian prince or Chinese merchant chooses to call for silver in payment of the commodities we or any other nation import from the East and thereby raises it to a premium in comparison with gold, then our gold and silver go out, not at the value fixed by us as coin, but at the value at which they are taken, simply as bullion.

Gold is still further depressed in value in comparison with silver, which is the sole standard of the principal commercial countries of Europe, save England; it is thus drawn very rapidly to Europe to fill the vacuum caused by the enormous exportation of silver to China, Japan, and India. The extent of this drain upon the silver of Europe and the necessary rise in price as compared with gold, and the consequent necessary flow of gold from those countries where it has a fixed value as compared with silver, like England and this country, where gold is the standard of value, may be seen from data derived from the books of the Oriental Steam Navigation Company, through whose agency alone the sum of $60,594,925 was transported to Asia from England solely in 1856; and increased in the following year to $83,976,160; to this add the sum of $16,758,445 from the rest of Europe, we have $100,729,605 as a startling efflux in silver only, from Europe to the East in a single year, or more than double the annual yield of all the silver mines that supply Europe and America.

To this must be added quite one tenth of that amount in gold, say $10,000,000. It will be observed that half of this amount of silver must be taken each year from the circulation of Europe, say $50,000,000, and its place supplied with gold; and both these exports of specie to the East are independent of that shipped directly from America, and are greater than the entire average product of the mines of California. The most careless consideration of this fact will conclusively show the reason why the Bank of England in the years 1856-57 was unable to restrain the efflux of gold from that kingdom, although she altered her rate of discount eight times during the year 1856, and nine times in 1857, quadrupling it in amount and ending in final bankruptcy and suspension in November of that year.

I have taken this period for comparison as it was before our war of rebellion and the cotton dearth, which so much affected the finances of England. This great drain still goes on. Is it wise, therefore, by legislative enactment to force a return to a currency by which all our values are to be measured, our productions exchanged and transported, our wealth to be distributed, and our industries to be governed, the very basis of which is controlled and fluctuated not only by the interests and commerce of the Christian and civilized world, but by the trade and needs of the half civilized and barbarous nations of the East.

Instead of this money, the instrument of tyrants, which has wrought all these evils, I propose a paper currency admittedly the cheapest and most convenient, its value based not only upon the gold in the country but upon every other source and element of the national prosperity, emancipated from the control of all other nations, whether civilized or barbarous. It is the currency for a free people, strong enough to maintain every other of their institutions against the world, whose Governments they have antagonized; strong enough to sustain the measure of their business transactions with each other independent of kings, the least, or bankers, now the most potent sovereigns in the world. It is one of the blessings of the war that we are enabled for the first time to stand alone in our industries and internal commerce as we have in our institutions.

It cannot fail to have attracted attention that the only remedy for all evils brought on by a currency convertible into specie when distress is upon the merchant, ruin upon the manufacturer, and disaster upon the banker, when the banks of the United States, of England, and of France could afford no aid, has always been a suspension of specie payments, i. e., by the use in these the foremost nations of the world of an inconvertible paper currency. If such currency is so potent as a remedy for all financial diseases which beset a nation, whether in peace or war, whether arising from over-trading, over-speculation, or over-investment, why may it not be equally beneficial as a fixed, permanent, and stable circulating medium to supply the demands of business and the necessities of the people.

The experiment of an inconvertible currency has been tried on the most extended scale and through long periods of time and under the most trying circumstances, and has never failed. In 1797, when the British empire was threatened with rebellion in Ireland, and was sustaining all Europe against the victories of Bonaparte with its subsidies of gold, the question came to her great war minister, Pitt, shall the integrity of the empire be lost? Shall France overrun all Europe and threaten great Britain in the East, or shall the currency of the empire be the inconvertible note of the Bank of England? He chose the latter. How wisely the success of England and the allied armies culminating at Waterloo attest. An inconvertible currency fought the battles of England and of the world from that Sunday morning, the 23d of February, 1797, when the King himself in council ordered the suspension of specie payments, till the 18th of June, 1815.

Irredeemable paper laid the foundation of England's manufacturing and commercial prosperity, supplied her navy which, at Trafalgar, made her the mistress of the seas, and procured the gold with which all the armies of Europe were paid, and for eighteen years there was neither financial revulsion, business panic, or distress. In answer to the objection that it is necessary to have gold currency for foreign trade I quote MacLaren, one of the most philosophical as well as accurate writers of England, in his History of the Currency:

"It is remarkable that no difficulty was experienced by our merchants in carrying on their trade with other nations during this period, though they no longer had a stock of bullion kept for them at the bank by means of which they might adjust their foreign payments. No inconvenience, indeed, of any kind was felt from the substitution of paper for gold, and, if the bank directors had so ordered their issues as to keep the mint and market price of gold on an equality, it seems that no objection could have been urged against the paper currency, except its liability to forgery, and we should never have heard of the currency controversy."

We remember our own war of the rebellion, without the legal-tender note, must have come to an end in the beginning of 1862; the banks had suspended, and, like broken reeds, the Government could no longer lean upon them; business was paralyzed, men and supplies could hardly be obtained, the armies were unpaid, and no decisive battle had been fought when Congress passed the legal-tender act of 1862. From that time business received a new impulse, labor was employed, manufactures everywhere sprang up, supplies were abundant, and although by a greater error the legal-tender note was not made the money of the Government for all purposes, as it should have been, yet, crippled as it was, it supplied and paid our soldiers, pensioned the wounded, provided for the widow and orphan, and produced a degree of prosperity theretofore unknown, which has been maintained ever since, and during this period of six years financial panics and disasters were unknown and unthought of until the insane attempt of the banker and capitalist to force a return to specie payments by a contraction of the currency.

During the year 1864 we exported more than one hundred millions of gold and silver, only $35,000,000 of which came from San Francisco, and no one knew the fact from any effect it had on the business of the country. In any other year, while our currency was upon a specie basis, the export of one tenth part of that sum beyond our production would have produced financial panics, ruin, and distress greater than that of 1837 when our total export of specie was less than six million dollars.

Point me to any other six years in the financial history of the country in which labor has been so well paid; in which production has been so varied and successful; in which there have not been more than one financial panic scattering ruin and disaster through the land. We have heard much of the patriotism of the bankers and capitalists who are said to have come forward to lend their gold to the country in its time of utmost need, but that is exactly what they did not do.

In December, 1861, the banks suspended specie payments without right, without authority of law, in violation of their own plighted faith and promises, so that neither the Government nor any one else could get a dollar of their gold from their vaults. When, in pursuance of the act of Congress of the 25th of February, 1862, $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes were issued, with which our soldiers were paid and the debts of the United States canceled, did the banks or capitalists loan these to the Government or did we make them for ourselves? On the contrary, the banks refused even to receive the Government notes on deposit. When the Government wanted more money to pay the soldier and carry on the war, did they get it from the banker and capitalist? No; they issued their own legal-tender notes as money and paid their debts. Having provided that these notes might be funded into a gold-bearing six per cent. bond, the capitalists bought them up when they fell to a discount of sixty per cent., by selling the gold at that premium which they had hoarded in their vaults and had refused to loan to the Government, and funded this, which they now call failed paper, in bonds for the payment of which in gold, or, what is equivalent, a return to specie payments, they now howl at the doors of the Capitol, unmindful of the destruction of value, the starving of the laborer, and the ruin and devastation they may cause.

Although this return to specie payment has been agitated ever since the war what petition has come up to you from the people demanding it at your hands? What meetings of the people have been held to make to you petitions for relief from grievances in this behalf? Not one; not one. Only resolutions of boards of trade and bankers.

I stand here, therefore, for inconvertible paper money, the greenback, which has fought our battles and saved our country, which has been held by us as a just equivalent for the blood of our soldiers, the lives of our sons, the widowhood of our daughters, and the orphanage of their children.

I stand here for a currency by which the business transactions of forty million people are safely and successfully done, which, founded on the faith, the wealth, and property of the nation, is at once the exemplar and engine of its industry and power—that money which saved the country in war and has given it prosperity and happiness in peace. To it four million men owe their emancipation from slavery; to it labor is indebted for elevation from that thrall of degradation in which it has been enveloped for ages. I stand for that money, therefore, which is by far the better agent and instrument of exchange of an enlightened and free people than gold and silver the money alike of the barbarian and the despot.

[The hour having expired during the delivery of Mr. BUTLER's speech, by unanimous consent his time was extended thirty minutes.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated by Mr. MOORE, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission of evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries.

DAVIS, HOLT, AND CAMPBELL COMMISSION.

Mr. SPALDING, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 403) providing for the disposition of certain papers; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that all the papers and evidence returned to the War Department by the Davis, Holt, and Campbell commission, touching claims against the department of the West accruing immediately before the 14th of October, 1861, shall be surrendered and turned over to the Attorney General, whose duty it shall be to cause the evidence to be examined, and such part thereof as has any bearing on cases pending in the Court of Claims shall be printed and received in said Court of Claims as if it were evidence taken under commission for said court, subject, however, to reexamination or cross-examination of the witness of either party.

Mr. SPALDING. The Committee on Appropriations unanimously instruct me to offer this resolution, and ask its passage by the House at this time. I will state in a few words the reason. When these claims were adjusted by the commission under a resolution of Congress—a commission consisting of one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of Judge Holt, who is at the head of the Bureau of Military Justice, and an eminent merchant in St. Louis—they carefully examined all these claims, and adjudicated that so much of them as they deemed just and equitable should be paid. The claimants received their money under that adjudication, and gave their receipts in full. But now, to our great astonishment, they bring their suits in the Court of Claims, and ask for the difference between what they originally claimed and what this commission declared they ought to have in satisfaction of their claims, and they allege that these receipts given in full were given under duress, and therefore that they are not to be bound by them. This resolution is offered at the instance of the Attorney General for the purpose of allowing the papers that were acted upon by that commission, so far as they have any bearing upon these cases in court to be introduced as evidence, subject however to be rebutted by evidence if the parties have it, and subject to cross examination, if it is desired, the evidence taken by the commission to be prima facie evidence before the Court of Claims. It will save trouble and expense to the nation, and will do no injustice, I think, to anybody.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would like to know what I am called upon to vote for.

Mr. SPALDING. I have just stated what the resolution proposes to do.

Mr. SCHENCK. What is it proposed to make evidence?

Mr. SPALDING. All the testimony that was before this commission when they adjudicated the claims.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is the testimony taken in this ex parte way to be conclusive, or is it to be taken for what it is worth?

Mr. SPALDING. For what it is worth; and the witnesses are to be subject to reexamination or cross-examination. It is all right.

Mr. SCHENCK. There ought to be something in the resolution to afford an opportunity for cross-examination.

Mr. SPALDING. That is provided for.

The joint resolution was then passed.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING, ETC.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to this House a copy of the report, made under the direction of the First Comptroller, the First Auditor, and the Register of the Treasury, in reference to the past and present condition of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, with the accompanying documents.

DELEGATE FROM WYOMING.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand the credentials of Mr. J. S. Casement, Delegate-elect from the Territory of Wyoming; and if there be no objection, I ask that he be sworn in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should like to know when this man was elected and who certifies to his election. There is no Governor there.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that he was elected, as was the case in almost all these Territories, before the organization of the Territory, and was sent here to act as the agent and Delegate of the Territory, as has been the custom and precedent heretofore; not according to any forms of law, but just as Representatives are elected from a Territory when it is about to become a State and are admitted to their seats when the State is admitted. There is no law for it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill organizing the Territory of Wyoming was passed at the close of the last session of Congress, and the territorial officers have not been appointed. I desire to know of the gentleman from Massachusetts if there has been any election in that Territory since it was organized?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly not; that is what I stated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I object to anything of this kind.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is for the House to decide.

Mr. DAWES. I move that Mr. Casement be sworn in. This is simply in accordance with the precedents heretofore. I do not know of any Territory that has been organized for many years from which a Delegate has not come here who was elected before the organization of the Territory, and upon the organization of the Territory he has been admitted. And so it has been in the case of States. When the State of Kansas was admitted into the Union, a gentleman who had been elected Representative before the State was admitted, without any provisions of law, was admitted to his seat here. There is no form of law under which this gentleman was elected. Before the organization of the Territory he was elected by the citizens of that Territory, and in accordance with the precedents, when the Territory is organized he applies for admission. He is here simply as the agent of the Territory. He has no vote in the House, and in no capacity can he act otherwise than as the agent of the Territory.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to know whether he is the agent of the Territory or of the Union Pacific Railroad Company?

Several MEMBERS. Ah! Ah!

Mr. DAWES. I have no knowledge of the facts beyond what I have stated to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to know how many votes he got, and how many votes any other parties got, and who signs the certificate of election?

Mr. DAWES. I have no knowledge of that. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, it is very extraordinary, it seems to me, that the gentleman from Massachusetts should come in here and ask us to elect a man Delegate from a Territory which has no existence.

Mr. CULLOM. Would it be in order to have the certificate read? I would like to know who signs it.

The SPEAKER. The credentials will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas at an election holden in that portion of the Territory of Dakota which comprises the proposed Territory of Wyoming, on the 8th day of October, A. D. 1867, which election was called by a mass meeting of the citizens residing in said district of country, and general notice thereof was given by the undersigned, who were appointed a committee by said mass meeting, and at such election J. S. Casement being a candidate for the office of Delegate in Congress to represent the interests of the aforesaid district of country did receive a majority of the votes cast at said election; Therefore,

It is hereby certified that the said J. S. Casement was at said election duly and legally elected to the office of Delegate in Congress as aforesaid.

In testimony whereof witness our hands and seals this 28th day of October, A. D. 1867.

[L. S.] THOMAS J. STREET,
[L. S.] LUCIAN L. BEDELL,
Commissioners of Election.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know how this paper is verified, whether any public seal is attached to it, or there is anything to authenticate it?

Mr. DAWES. Nobody pretends that he was elected in conformity to existing law. It is simply in conformity to the precedents which I have cited. I know nothing about the facts. The credentials were handed to me this morning to present.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman present this as chairman of the Committee of Elections?

Mr. DAWES. I do not.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the gentleman's committee had better examine it.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections whether there has ever before been a case like the one now presented, where admission is asked for a gentleman who was elected previous to the organization of the Territory?

Mr. DAWES. There have been many such precedents. It is due to the Committee of Elections to say that they had nothing to do with it. These credentials came to me this morning, and I have presented them to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman yields to me for a moment, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the condition of this case. My friend from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, comes here, not making a report from the Committee of Elections, and asks us to admit a man to be sworn in and draw pay and mileage for this Congress as a Delegate from a part of the country where there was no Territory, and that upon the mere certificate of a mass meeting, signed by individuals of whom we know nothing. He proposes to admit him as a member of this body. I do not know any precedent for this proceeding. I do not believe that any can be shown. If there is any, then I am for making a new precedent. Let us have a Delegate elected by the Territory of Wyoming as it has been organized, and let him come here with a certificate properly authenticated by the governor and the seal of the Territory.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand the gentleman to say that there was no Territory there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No Territory of Wyoming.

Mr. MAYNARD. It was a part of the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was a part of Dakota, but not organized as the Territory of Wyoming; and Dakota was represented at the very time this man claims to have been elected.

Mr. SPALDING. He was not elected at a mass meeting, but on a general ticket.

Mr. DAWES. What the gentleman from Illinois says is true, that this is an irregular proceeding. It is due to me to say that I do not ask that this man shall be admitted upon this floor, on any claim that he was elected according to law. If the gentleman will look back in the history of the Territories he will find that this is not unusual. I agree that it is irregular. I have never said that it was right. Congress has admitted both members and Delegates chosen in this manner during the last twenty years. It is the precedent which has been established. If the House wishes to establish another one, that a Delegate shall not be elected until after the organization of the Territory, it will be satisfactory to me. It was done in the case of Minnesota. The State of Minnesota was carved out of the Territory of Minnesota, and two members admitted upon this floor, although chosen without any law authorizing the election, and before the State was organized; and then a man who was chosen in the same way for Delegate for the balance of the Territory was admitted upon the floor of this House. Thus two men as members of Congress representing the State of Minnesota, and another man as Delegate for the balance of the Territory, were admitted to the floor of this House. When the gentleman has made that examination, he will admit that what he stated just now is not correct; that is, that there was no precedent of this kind. It is precisely like all the rest of the cases to which I have referred, it is not regular. If the House desires to put a stop to this irregularity it will find no opposition on my part.

Mr. MAYNARD. My recollection is not entirely distinct; but I have a pretty decided recollection that the Minnesota members, to whom the gentleman refers, were elected under the authority of the convention that framed the State constitution. Minnesota was organized as a Territory, and the people there desiring to be admitted as a State called a convention, which framed a constitution, which was submitted to Congress for approval.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman is desirous to find any parallel, I will ask him to explain under what authority Governor Reeder and Mr. Whitfield were admitted to represent the Territory of Kansas, and under what authority the gentleman who represented Kansas in the first Congress after the State was admitted was elected. I do not make any opposition to any disposition the House desires to make of these credentials.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move that these credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections, so that they can examine them, and report what the precedents are. And upon that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to refer was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHINESE REVENUE COMMISSION, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In conformity with the requirements of the sixth section of the act of the 22d of June, 1860, to carry into effect provisions of the treaty with China and certain other Oriental nations, I transmit to Congress a copy of eight rules agreed upon between the Chinese Imperial Government and the minister of the United States and those of other foreign Powers accredited to that Government for conducting the proceedings of the joint tribunal in cases of confiscation and fines for breaches of the revenue laws of that empire. These rules, which are accompanied by correspondence between our minister and Secretary of State on the subject, are commended to the consideration of Congress with a view to their approval.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1869.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ILLEGAL FEES OF CONSULS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a House resolution of the 5th instant, relative to consular officers of the United States demanding or receiving greater fees than are allowed by law; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

COMMERCE WITH CANADA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional report of Hon. Israel T. Hatch, of New York, special agent of the Treasury Department, upon the commercial relations of the United States with Canada; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF S. AND H. SAYLES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of a board organized by the War Department for the investigation of the claims of S. & H. Sayles, of Killingly, Connecticut, for loss sustained by them in the rejection of certain kerseys furnished under contract; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

SAC AND FOX INDIANS, KANSAS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting estimate of appropriation required to fulfill treaty stipulations with Sac and Fox Indians, Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CROW INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting estimate of appropriation for pay of agent for Crow Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting estimate of appropriation required to fulfill treaty stipulations with the Crow Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

KENTUCKY UNIVERSITY.

Mr. BECK asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the Committee of Claims the papers of the Kentucky University, at Lexington, Kentucky, for the purpose of filing them with the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks indefinite leave of absence for the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BAOKS,] on account of the death of a relative; and the gentleman has requested the Chair to state that his absence yesterday was on this account.

Leave was granted.

Mr. KELSEY obtained leave of absence for four days.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Congressional Printer, in response to a resolution of the House asking the cause of the delay in the printing of the Agricultural Report for 1867; which was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. As this communication is brief, and as many members may desire to explain to their constituents the cause of the delay in printing this report, the Clerk will, if there be no objection, read the communication.

There being no objection the Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.
WASHINGTON, January 12, 1869.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 9th instant, directing the Congressional Printer to inform the House the cause of delay in furnishing for distribution the "Agricultural Report of 1867."

In answer, I respectfully submit the following: On the 30th of June last the House ordered the printing of two hundred thousand copies of the report, which, added to the number ordered by the Senate, makes the whole number two hundred and twenty-four thousand five hundred copies.

A portion of the copy was furnished this office on the 1st day of September, which was completed on the 12th of October. The office was then without additional copy until the 23d of November. Had the copy been furnished immediately after the order to print was given in June last, the report would have been printed and bound before this time.

It is but just to the Commissioner of Agriculture to say that he has given, in a note to the report itself, the following reason why copy was not sooner furnished:

"It is my intention hereafter to secure greater promptness in the publication of the report, a reform beyond my power to initiate in the issue of this volume, for which no preparation was made upon my accession to the office, owing to the death of the former Commissioner."

When it is known that it requires the enormous amount of two hundred and twenty-five tons of printing paper to complete it, some idea may be formed of the pressure upon this establishment, especially when it is to be done at a time when all the annual documents are to be printed and bound.

Notwithstanding these facts, however, I hope to be able to commence the delivery of the report on the 25th of the present month, and to continue to do so at the rate of about two thousand per day until all are delivered.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOHN D. DEFREES,
Congressional Printer.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE.

Mr. SCHENCK. There has been prior to this session a joint committee on ordnance, composed of Senators and Representatives. It is thought that the construction of the rule of the Senate requires the adoption of a concurrent resolution to revive the committee for this session. A resolution adopted by the Senate for this purpose has been on the Speaker's table for some time; and as there are two or three important subjects requiring the early attention of this committee I hope the House will consent that the resolution of the Senate may be taken from the table and concurred in.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the House the concurrent resolution, which has been on the table since the 14th of December last.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 14, 1868.

Resolved, That the joint Committee on Ordnance appointed at the first session of the present Congress and continued at the last session be, and the same is hereby, continued during the present session.

Ordered, That Mr. HOWARD, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. DRAKE be the committee on the part of the Senate.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. LOGAN, Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. SCHENCK.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, who were directed by the House March 30, 1867, to investigate the matter of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, in response to the memorial of Edward Learned, respectfully report that the conclusions of the committee are embodied in the two following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the committee May 21, 1867:

1. That under the order of the House upon the memorial of Edward Learned the duty of the committee will be performed by such an examination of the facts in reference to the organization and conduct of the company engaged in the construction of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, as shall satisfy the committee whether or not the United States has a lien upon said road for the bonds issued to aid in the construction thereof, as provided in the act of Congress of July 2, 1864.

2. The committee having heard the parties and examined the various papers submitted, are of opinion that the lien of the United States upon said road is not affected by any of the alleged irregularities and illegal proceedings by the company engaged in the construction of the same; and this without expressing an opinion whether said proceedings are irregular and illegal or otherwise, the questions raised by the parties being questions for the courts, rather than for the action of Congress.

For the committee:

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. BAGLEY.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1673) to relieve William H. Bagley, of Wake county, North Carolina; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides, two thirds of each House concurring therein, that all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States shall be removed from William H. Bagley, of Wake county, North Carolina.

Mr. BOUTWELL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The bill was then passed, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that it be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I object to making it the special order.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by a majority vote.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If this is not made a special order the tariff bill will then come up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That makes no difference. The House can, when the time comes, determine on what bill they will go into the committee upon. If it is his bill, then that will be the special order. If not, then it will not be the special order.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary rule is somewhat different. The committee must act on the special order unless it is set aside. The tariff bill is not the special order in the committee, but it is the unfinished business when there are no special orders.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Let the tariff bill be made the special order, and after that the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER. The tariff bill cannot be made the special order except by unanimous consent, but a majority can make a general appropriation bill the special order.

The House divided on Mr. WASHBURN'S motion; and there were—ayes 61, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. MOORHEAD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 88.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that I reserve all points of order.

EULOGIES ON THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. CAKE, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed under the supervision of the Clerk of the House thirty thousand extra copies of the eulogies on Thaddeus Stevens for the use of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INAUGURATION BALL.

Mr. COVODE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That so much of the Capitol as is hereinafter mentioned be granted to the committee of control, in which to conduct the inaugural proceedings, other than official, of President and Vice President, on the 4th of March next, to wit: the Rotunda, the old Hall of Representatives, the Senate corridors and Senate public reception room, the passages leading thence to the Rotunda and old Hall, and so much of the basement not used by the committees as may be required; the Senate Chamber, Hall of Representatives, committee-rooms, and all other parts of the building to be closed to the public, except the east entrance to the Senate, the occupation not to take place until after the official inauguration, and the building to remain all the time in charge of and under the control of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. COVODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 584) relating to the time of finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ANTHRACITE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CAKE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1611) to incorporate the Government Anthracite Railroad Company; and the same was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills, &c., were referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF ALASKA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1670) to provide a temporary government for the territory of Alaska; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

ELECTION OF DELEGATES.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1671) to provide for the election of Delegates to the Congress of the United States from the several Territories; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 940) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union, on which Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, was entitled to the floor for one hour.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House has for its object the equalization of bounties to soldiers and sailors upon the basis of eight and one third dollars per month for each month of actual service to every soldier and sailor honorably discharged, deducting from this all bounties, national, State, and local, and well known in the House as SCHENCK'S bounty bill. My own individual preference was to only deduct the national bounty, but believing that the bill in that shape would not meet with favor I have consented to take what I believe will meet the approbation of the House.

The distinctive feature of this bill, and in which it differs from all others heretofore reported, is that while the basis of settlement is established at a certain fixed rate per month, the actual bounty is paid in land. And yet it does not contemplate a system of land warrants, which must of necessity be unequal. The committee have endeavored in this bill to combine the benefits of a cash settlement and a land payment.

The bill provides that the Second Auditor, under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall audit the claims arising under this bill, and for the balance, after making the proper deductions, issue to the soldier or sailor a certificate showing the amount due said soldier or sailor, this certificate to bear six per cent. interest until paid, but is to be paid only as provided for in this bill; that is, these certificates are to be receivable as cash at any of the land offices of the United States in payment for land purchased by the original claimant or his heirs. This clause, it is believed, will prevent the assignment of these certificates and their accumulation in the hands of speculators, as they can only be used by the soldier or his heirs, but at the same time, if the soldier prefers to hold the certificate, it is daily increasing in value by the accumulation of interest. I shall not urge the passage of this bill upon the ground that the soldiers demand it, for I believe the large majority are too proud to demand what right and justice should give without. Nor do I propose to weigh the mother's tears and the wife's anguish against coin, and find how much is yet due. Nor would I throw into the scale the long, weary marches, the dreary night watches, too often disturbed by the sharp crack of the rifle announcing another picket one, the days of scorching fever, and the suffering anguish of the hospital, or the terrible excitement of such battle-fields as Gettysburg and Stone river, Pea Ridge and Antietam, Vicksburg and the Wilderness. This task I shall leave for some future historian, who, writing by the bright blaze of our nation's coming greatness, shall see and feel what they were worth. Nor would I make an invidious comparison between the soldier and the civilian. Ballots were as necessary as bullets, and it is hard to tell to whom the greatest meed of praise should be given: to the old men and the young men who detained at home cast the ballots that reflected Abraham Lincoln, or the Boys in Blue, who carried the muskets and scattered the hosts of the rebellion. We are and should be joint heirs of that glorious reward, an undivided, indivisible country.

This bill only proposes to remove an inequality between soldiers themselves. A portion, and a very deserving portion, have not received from the Government the same generous acknowledgment accorded to others fighting on the same battle-fields and sharing mutual hardships. To the soldiers of the early part of the war we desire to give a small token that we appreciate the patriotism that called them from the plow and the workshop to our nation's rescue. That this inequality exists is admitted by all. Can we, in justice to the country, remedy it? Perhaps it may be well to inquire what we have already done in the way of paying bounties. The following table shows the amounts paid by the General Government:

The able chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, [Mr. JULIAN,] in his report against granting lands to soldiers, basis his opposition to the same upon the reason that it will lock up and throw into the hands of speculators nearly one fourth of the arable land belonging to the Government. The bill under discussion differs materially from the one so ably opposed by my colleague. No transfer of the certificate except by heirship is allowed, and of course no speculation. Nor shall I trouble myself with the objection that another Congress will make them assignable; they will be as well qualified, I trust, and perhaps have more light upon what ought to be done with the public domain than the present. No such large quantity as he represents will be needed under this bill.

The whole number of troops receiving $100 bounty during the whole war was only nine hundred and sixteen thousand eight hundred and ninety-four; of this number a large per cent. reenlisted and received the large bounties of the later years of the war. These should not be counted in making the amount to yet receive bounties. If we take as the average of our Army a million of men, and their term of service four years, which is large, much too large, we only have $400,000,000 as the total bounty to be paid, and out of this amount the Government has already paid $350,000,000, not taking into the estimate $286,781,256 09 paid by the States themselves. Fifty million dollars will, in my opinion, more than cover all the bounties under this bill; and to prove that this is correct, the present bounty bill has only called for about forty-six million dollars, and this bill will take but little more; not one quarter of the amount that so startled the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands; but so far from taking from the Government Treasury, I believe it will conduce much towards replenishing her coffers. The purchasing of large tracts in a body is a detriment, but where they are small, as these will have to be, they are a help to the actual settler. They assist in making roads, buildings, school-houses, and paying taxes generally; and those of us who have lived in new countries know that the settlers know full well how to make them pay their full share.

Nor will it prove detrimental to the homestead principle. Many a poor soldier will continue to get West or South, settle on his quarter section under the homestead law, and purchase near it with his scrip, that would not otherwise go West at all. Some of our States deem that as they paid large local bounties they would get no share of the benefits derived from this bill. The following statement from Colonel Gibson, in charge of the payments under the act of 1866, shows the payments to each State; and as the most of these cases will be entitled to an additional hundred, it will be seen at a glance that the disparity between the different States does not exist:

In closing, allow me to use the words of my colleague, [Mr. JULIAN,] over two years ago: "Equality is equity," and the nation cannot refuse to heed this maxim in dealing with the brave men who protected the law-makers of this Capitol during the war, and saved the country itself from destruction. Nor do we accept the plea of national poverty, so often urged, in the light of the boundless resources developed by our war of four years. The amount required for a fair equalization of these bounties, we are sure, has been much over-stated; but whatever it may be, we think it should be provided for with no unnecessary delay. "With the soldiers there was no task too great, no sacrifice too large, no duty too arduous, no hardship too severe; but with an alacrity that marked their earnestness in the cause, they cheerfully responded to every order; claiming none other shield than the consciousness that their banners were the emblems of liberty, of justice, and of truth." The prayer of these men must neither be denied nor evaded when they only ask the nation for justice.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, when my honorable colleague some time ago asked that this bill might be made a special order for one hour to-day, being opposed decidedly to the measure, I only agreed that it might be made the special order on the express condition that no action was to be had on it now. It is hardly necessary therefore to debate it at length. I have already discussed it with a good deal of thoroughness in a speech during the last session, and what I said in opposition to the policy and the principle of the bill is substantially untouched by any word that has been uttered by my colleague. I have had no opportunity to examine the facts and figures adduced by him as to the amount of money his bill would require; but if his calculations are correct, cutting down the aggregate amount to fifty millions, he simply mitigates the force of the unanswered argument that I made on the basis of a larger amount. That argument has not been met, and I believe cannot be met; and perhaps I may as well restate it, so that the House may consider it in connection with that of my colleague. I will add, in the outset, that I subscribe to-day to every word of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands as quoted by my colleague; and that my opposition to this bill is perfectly consistent with what I said in that report.

Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that, instead of assignable land warrants, there shall be issued to the soldier a certificate of indebtedness for the amount of his bounty, computed at the rate of eight and one third dollars per month for his time of service, and drawing six per cent. interest, which certificate shall be used only by him or his heirs, and be payable only in land. This, in effect, though in other words, is the same thing as so many non-assignable land warrants. These certificates, as I shall presently show, would certainly be made assignable by Congress at an early day; but for the sake of the argument I will admit that their non-assignable character is to be preserved, and that such is the bona fide purpose of the bill. It must follow, then, most conclusively, that its aim is not to give land to those who really need it for cultivation. The fraction of our soldiers who are farmers, and actually want homes on the public domain, can have them now, under the homestead law; and under the House bill before referred to, which will doubtless pass the Senate, the soldier can have a home on the lands of the Government without money and without price. Probably a small portion only of our soldiers and seamen desire to settle on the public domain; but those of them who do would seek title under the homestead law, since a gift of lands under that would be just as good as a gift under a law providing the same thing under the name of bounty, while the certificates of indebtedness would of course be used in the purchase of other and additional lands, to be held for some indefinite time for a rise in the price. Who does not see that this would be the exact operation of this measure? The lands taken under it would be withheld from settlement and tillage, for the palpable reason that no man would buy them when just such lands could be had free of cost. To argue otherwise is first-rate nonsense. The quantity of land which would thus be locked up from the landless and laboring poor of the country is given in the following official letter from Secretary Stanton, in April last, in answer to an inquiry addressed to him by myself:

"In compliance with the request of the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives, for a statement of the amount of public lands necessary to meet the requirements of the proposed bill (H. R. No. 940) 'to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union,' in the event of its becoming a law, I have the honor to communicate a report on the subject by the Paymaster General of the Army, dated the 2d instant, as follows:

"In a communication from this office to the Secretary of War, and dated March 31, 1866, will be found a carefully-prepared estimate of the amount of money required to pay the bounties under a bill then pending in the Senate introduced by the chairman of the Military Committee.

"That bill was substantially the same in its terms as this House bill No. 940, except as to the manner of making payment.

"The sum estimated was $253,631,100.

"In my letter of August 6, 1866, addressed to General Vincent, Assistant Adjutant General, will be found another carefully-prepared estimate, showing the amount required to pay the additional bounties provided by the law of July 23, 1860.

"The sum estimated was $58,634,300.

"Experience so far gives indication that this last estimate is rather short than in excess of the exact truth.

"Deducting this cost of the additional bounties from the amount of the first estimate for equalization of bounties, the remainder gives a pretty close approximate estimate of the further amount that would be required under the bill in question, namely: $195,036,800, which, in land at $1 25 per acre, will require one hundred and fifty-six millions forty-five thousand four hundred and forty acres. No note is taken herein of the local bounties not paid by the United States, for I have no means of ascertaining their amount."

The local bounties referred to, could they ever be ascertained, would somewhat reduce this estimate, but the aggregate amount may safely be set down as not falling very much below one hundred and fifty millions of acres. This immense area, enough for an empire, being equal in extent to the thirteen original colonies, save North Carolina and Pennsylvania, double the area of Great Britain and Ireland, and nearly nineteen millions of acres larger than the French empire, and consisting, of course, of picked arable land, is to be withheld from cultivation and productive wealth, in order that the soldier, who needs his bounty now in money, may at some future time get it in the price of his land, which is kept idle at the nation's expense, and to the cruel wrong of multitudes who long for homes. We convert him into a land-jobber, and conspire with him against the productive industry of the country. We set aside the homestead law as to more than one fourth of the tillable portion of the public domain by excluding from it the poor who would coin their labor into national wealth, extend the borders of our civilization, and realize the blessings of independence. It is said, I know, that we are not able to pay the soldier his bounty in money, and that we have nothing else but land with which to satisfy him. This I deny. The nation is able to do justice to its heroic defenders, and cannot honorably plead poverty as an excuse. But if that plea is to be accepted, then I reply that we are still less able to dedicate to solitude from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of acres of land, which else might be carved up into small homesteads, to be tilled by their owners and made the basis of revenue and of national wealth. The country, with all its great resources, is too poor thus to cut off its supplies by wholesale prostitution of its means and its opportunities, and it could far better afford to pay the soldier a reasonable bounty in money. Not one acre of land which any poor man needs for cultivation should be denied him in the interest of those who would grasp it for mere speculation. A member of this House from Illinois informs me that in the western border of that State George Peabody, years ago, purchased thousands of acres of wild lands, which he holds to-day. Settlers have established themselves around these lands, built their houses, planted their orchards, and created wealth. The grain and other products of their farms which are annually shipped to market on the railways made necessary by the settlement of the country, go to make up the sum of our national wealth. These settlers are every day adding to the value of Mr. Peabody's lands, while other settlers, who would long since have made them productive, have been driven further West in search of homes. The Government thus entered into partnership with Peabody in cheating our pioneer producers out of the homes to which they were entitled on these lands, and in staying the industrial development of the West for the benefit of nobody in the world but a single monopolist, whose home is on the other side of the Atlantic. I do not brand George Peabody as a robber, for he is known as an honorable, patriotic, and liberal man. The Government of the United States licensed him to do these things, as it has licensed other land speculators, and has been itself the plunderer of its citizens and the practical foe of national progress. But these evils are multiplied and compounded by the bill I am now discussing, for instead of a few thousands of acres it grasps many millions, and although the owners are multiplied the homeless poor of the country are equally excluded from this immense area which the nation pledged to them by its preemption and homestead laws.

Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this measure on the supposition that the bounty it proposes is to go to the soldier only, or his heirs, and that the certificates of indebtedness are never to be made assignable. I have thus given the proposition its best possible face, and have shown, I think, the utter impolicy if not viciousness of the project. I speak of course of the measure itself, and not of the motives of its friends, which I doubt not are patriotic. But the truth is that should it become a law the certificates of indebtedness would be made assignable. On this subject I beg leave to quote from a recent letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he speaks of this bill in the light of actual facts. He says:

"I have examined the inclosed bill (H. R. No. 940) to equalize bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union, which I had the honor to receive from you with the request for a statement as to the probable effect of the measure in the light of the experience of this office."

"I find the bill provides for the issue to soldiers, sailors, and marines of interest-bearing certificates, to be used by them or their heirs in payment for public land which they may hereafter purchase from the Government; that such certificates are in no wise transferable, and that the interest may continue to accrue without limitation until the recipient may see fit to purchase land therewith."

"The act of September 28, 1850, granting bounty lands to soldiers who had served in any of the wars in which the United States had been engaged, contained a provision that the warrants thereby authorized to be issued should be located by the soldier or his heirs, thus preventing their assignment and sale. This provision gave such general dissatisfaction that Congress passed the act of March 22, 1852, authorizing the transfer of any warrant then issued or to be issued."

"The files and records of this office show that not one in five hundred of the land warrants issued and placed in the hands of the soldiers or their heirs have been located by them, or for their use and benefit; and further, that although the said act of March 22, 1852, made such warrants assignable, it is safe to assume that not to exceed ten per cent. of them have been used by preëmptors as assignees in payment for actual settlements, the most part having been used by persons to acquire title to the public lands for speculative purposes."

"Should the bill under consideration become a law, and by future legislation be so modified as to make the certificates assignable or available to the soldier or his heirs without becoming settlers on the public lands, there is no reason that can be suggested by this office why results like those in respect to the past issues may not be looked for in regard to the certificates contemplated by the present measure, the effect of which would be to transfer to non-resident proprietors large bodies of the public domain."

That, sir, is the authoritative statement of Commissioner Wilson, whose judgment, experience, and familiarity with the whole subject no one will question. That these certificates would be made assignable there can scarcely be a single doubt. The great body of our soldiers need their bounty now, and not the promise of it at some time in the uncertain future; and if the relative handful of the soldiers of our Mexican war were strong enough to carry a bill through Congress making their warrants assignable, it is quite certain the like thing would happen now at the bidding of the hosts who would demand it. Indeed, I believe some of the friends of the bill do not disguise the fact that ultimately these certificates are to become assignable by law, so that the holders of them may realize their value in money.

What, then, would be the effect of such legislation, both as to the soldier and the public domain? Mr. Wilson, in the letter I have quoted, says that not one in five hundred of the Mexican war land warrants were located by the soldiers or for their use and benefit, and that not to exceed ten per cent. of them have been used by preëmptors as assignees in payment for actual settlements, the most part having been used by persons to acquire title to the public lands for speculative purposes. He predicts very naturally the same mischievous results from the present bill should it become a law. But I ask particular attention to the following additional facts which I copy from the carefully-prepared report of the House Committee on the Public Lands already referred to:

"At the close of the last fiscal year there remained outstanding fifty-three thousand nine hundred and twelve military bounty-land warrants, issued under various acts of Congress, calling for the aggregate quantity of five million six hundred and three thousand two hundred and twenty acres. These warrants are selling at about one dollar per acre. Under the agricultural college act of 1852 scrip has been issued to non-public land holding States to the amount of five million three hundred and forty acres; and when the States of the South shall have received their shares under the act, the whole amount of land covered by it will be nine million six hundred thousand acres. This will be the subject of monopoly in the hands of speculators, and the price of the scrip will depend, to a considerable extent, upon the quantity of it in market and of the unlocated military bounty-land warrants. The price has generally ranged from sixty to seventy cents per acre, but has sometimes gone much lower. As further affecting the price of warrants and scrip it should be remembered that over forty-three million acres of swamp and overflowed lands have been granted by Congress to the States, more than one half of which is probably in the hands of monopolists; that about two hundred millions of acres have been granted to aid in building railroads and for other purposes of internal improvements thus inaugurating further and fearful monopolies of the public domain; and that millions of acres of Indian lands, by virtue of the most pernicious treaty stipulations, are falling into the hands of monopolists, thus still further aggravating the wide-spread evils long since inflicted upon the country by the ruinous policy of land speculation. Every day gives birth to some new scheme of monopoly by which the paramount right of the people to homes on the public domain is abridged or denied, and its productive wealth seriously retarded; and no one will need be told that, should this policy be continued, the opportunities of settlement and tillage under the preemption and homestead laws must constantly diminish."

Mr. Speaker, I ask gentlemen to keep these facts in remembrance in considering the effect of this measure upon the soldier. I ask them to remember the present price of college scrip, the quantity of which is yet to be almost doubled, and which at one time sold as low as thirty-seven and a half cents per acre. Let them bear in mind the amount of old bounty-land warrants yet outstanding, and the stupendous monopoly of the public domain which is going on in other directions and threatening to swallow it up, and then ask themselves what would be the effect of putting in the market from one to two millions of assignable certificates payable in land. Every man can answer this question for himself, but I believe I am safe in saying that the price would fall as low as twenty-five cents per acre. Our Mexican land warrants at one time sold at from thirty-five to forty cents per acre, and this, it must be remembered, was before the enactment of the homestead law, while the quantity of warrants was a small fraction only of that of the certificates now proposed to be issued. The Great Republic, in speaking of this bill, says that after "paying notary and attorney's fees the whole money value to the soldiers of such a grant would not exceed $20,000,000, and it would be a hundred times better for the country to make this payment in money, and thus leave the public domain to the laboring masses. The veil thrown over this hideous speculation is too thin to cheat the soldiers or citizens of the country. It should be stopped where it is. If further bounty is to be paid, let it be honestly paid in money, and thus close the door against further speculations in what is designed for, and should be reserved as, the homes of the industrious millions."

This is from the pen of Judge Edmonds, late Commissioner of the General Land Office, and one of the truest and most sagacious of our public men; and it appears in the columns of a well-conducted and influential journal, which I understand to be one of the principal organs of the loyal soldiers and sailors of the United States. He adds, that "the soldiers have asked for no such measure, nor do they want to be made the objects of any such fictitious gratitude," and declares that "the obligations of the country to them would be nearly canceled should they knowingly and purposely allow so monstrous a scheme of monopoly against the laboring men of the country to be perpetrated in their name."

But while the bill would thus prove a violated promise to the soldier, its effect upon the public domain would be still more deplorable. On this point I take leave to quote again from the same report:

"All the evils of land speculation, to an extent as alarming as it would be unprecedented, would be the sure result. Capital, always sensitive and sagacious, would grasp these warrants at the lowest rates. Land monopoly in the United States, under this national sanction, would have its new birth, and enter upon a career of wide-spread mischief and desolation. Speculators would seize and appropriate nearly all the choice lands of the Government, and those nearest the settled portions of the country, while homestead claimants and preëmptors would be driven to the outskirts of civilization, meeting all the increased expense and danger of securing homes for their families, and surrendering the local advantages of schools, churches, mills, wagon-roads, and whatever else pertains to the necessities and enjoyments of a well-settled neighborhood. This policy would stop the advancing column of immigration from Europe, and of emigration from the States, which has done so much to make the public domain a source of productive wealth, a subject of revenue, and a home for the landless thousands who have thus at once become useful citizens and an element of national strength. It would, in fact, amount to a virtual overthrow of the beneficent policy of the homestead law, which has, perhaps, done more to make the American name honored and loved among the Christian nations of the earth than any single enactment since the formation of the Government."

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the facts embodied in this brief summary ought to settle this question in the minds of all men who will lay aside passion and allow themselves for a single moment to think. With me they are absolutely conclusive. I claim to be as true a friend to the soldier as any man in this Congress or out of it; but I am likewise the friend of the millions who toil, whether soldiers or civilians, and cannot, therefore, unite with any man or set of men, for any purpose, in opposing the homestead law, either by open assault or the insidious policy of indirection. I am quite as unwilling to aid in its overthrow now, on the pretense of giving bounties to soldiers, as I was five years ago on the specious ground of paying our national debt. Its policy is constantly invaded by stupendous grants to railroad corporations, by corrupt Indian treaties which sweep away the rights of settlers and curse vast districts of country, and by the growing spirit of monopoly, shown in multiplied forms, and threatening the very principle of democratic equality in the Republic. Sir, the duty to which we are summoned is not that of submission or acquiescence but of unflinching resistance to these unchristian and anti-republican tendencies of our time. No ephemeral advantages, if they were attainable by an opposite course, could atone for the enduring mischiefs to the country which would certainly ensue.

Mr. Speaker, if any further argument addressed to this House is needed I find it at hand. This body, in March last, passed without a division the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in order to carry into full and complete effect the spirit and policy of the preemption and homestead laws of the United States the further sale of the agricultural public lands ought to be prohibited by law; and that all proposed grants of land to aid in the construction of railroads, or for other special objects, should be carefully scrutinized and rigidly subordinated to the paramount purpose of securing homes for the landless poor, the actual settlement and tillage of the public domain, and the consequent increase of the national wealth."

Sir, I am quite sure the sentiment of this resolution would be most heartily indorsed by the great body of the people of the United States. Let us stand by it in the face of all temptations. It utters the true watchword and rallying cry of the people of all parties, and its gospel must be preached and practiced if our great national patrimony is to be saved from the greed of monopolists and the rapacity of thieves. I do not believe this House will now go back on the record it has made. Indeed, some of the friends of this bounty bill assure me that they desire its passage because they believe Congress will soon carry into effect the resolution I have quoted by providing that no more of our public lands shall be sold except under the preemption and homestead laws, the effect of which, they say, would be to bring these certificates of indebtedness nearly to par. I sincerely hope Congress will be wise enough to do what is predicted. I even hope for it at this session; but I deny that any such effect on the price of certificates would result. Such a measure could not interfere with the holders of college scrip, nor land warrants, nor Indian scrip, through which land could still be bought without the condition of occupancy and improvement; nor could it undo those huge land monopolies already existing under our Indian-treaty policy and swamp land legislation, through which the trade in land will be lively for a good while to come. There will be ways enough left to buy land without the obligation to live upon and cultivate it after the bill I reported to this House some months ago to prohibit further land speculation shall have become a law. In no event would the price of these certificates give the soldier the bounty he is entitled to ask; but if it would, the injury which this policy would inflict upon the country, as I have already shown, utterly forbids its adoption. The soldier, if he understands this, will not ask it, and the nation has no right to entail upon itself a great and irreparable wrong in order to prevent a minor one, which it may remedy in another way, if any present remedy is indispensable. The best friend of the nation's patriotic defenders is the friend of justice and the public welfare; and the men who were unselfish enough to offer their lives as a sacrifice for these will never ask the representatives of the people to trample them under foot.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. In pursuance of the agreement by which this bill was brought into the House, as it could not come in under the rules in any other way, I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I propose, then, to move a reconsideration, so that whenever the House has leisure we may take it up again.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois; and there were—ayes 38, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JULIAN. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. It is not, now. The bill has been recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to ask whether if the motion to reconsider is laid on the table it does not defeat the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will leave the bill with the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will it not prevent its ever being brought back?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is not a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will that committee have an opportunity to report again this session?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The committee will not be called again; they have been called once this session. The success of this motion would kill the bill.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 81, not voting 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Blair, Boles, Boyden, Broomall, Cary, Chanler, Cornell, Driggs, Eliot, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Higby, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Thomas L. So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question recurred upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move that the motion to reconsider be postponed for three weeks—until Tuesday, the 2d of February next; after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call the previous question on that motion.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to postpone was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The first business in order is the consideration of reports from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BANKS. I will yield if no great time is consumed by the gentleman.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. PIKE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 941, to amend certain acts relative to the Navy and Marine corps.

No objection was made.

Mr. PIKE. I now move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be asked for.

Mr. PAINE. Let the amendments be read.

Mr. PIKE. I can explain them in less time than would be required to read them.

Mr. PAINE. Very well.

Mr. PIKE. The House passed a bill some time since reducing the engineer corps and also reducing the Marine corps of the Navy. The Senate agreed partially to the bill of the House. We now ask a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion of Mr. PIKE was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. PIKE, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. ARCHER.

GOVERNMENT GRANTS, ETC.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Commerce a bill to prevent the alienation to foreigners of grants or privileges from the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length. It provides that it shall not be lawful, without the express consent of Congress first obtained, to assign or transfer to any alien person or foreign corporation, any charter, grant, or privilege given by or derived from the United States, and designed to promote or regulate commerce with any foreign nation or the dominions thereof.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to this bill. I understand very well the object of it; it is in the interest of the Atlantic cable monopoly.

Mr. BANKS. I presented it at the request of another member.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that.

CLAIMS AGAINST RUSSIA.

Mr. BANKS. I have been instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the following resolution for action at this time, upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved, That the President be requested to use the good offices of this Government for the purpose of obtaining from the Russian Government a prompt and just consideration and settlement of the claims of Benjamin W. Perkins and other citizens of the United States arising under contracts with said Russian Government, made pending the Crimean war.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAYTI AND SAN DOMINGO PROTECTORATE.

Mr. BANKS. I have been instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report for consideration at this time a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 405) extending the protection of the United States to the republics of Hayti and San Domingo was then read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the President of the United States to extend to the Governments and people of the republics of Hayti and San Domingo the protection of the United States for the purpose of assisting them to establish permanent republican institutions whenever those Governments, or either of them, shall apply to the United States for its protection, or whenever the President shall be satisfied that the Governments and people of those republics desire or voluntarily consent to the protection of this Government; provided that the President shall communicate to the two Houses of Congress immediate information of any action which the Government of the United States may take upon this subject; and provided also that no action which may call for or require any appropriation of money from the Treasury of the United States shall be authorized or commenced under the authority of this resolution without the previous consent of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman propose that the House shall act upon this resolution to-day?

Mr. BANKS. I wish to state the grounds upon which this joint resolution is presented, and if the general judgment of the House be not against it I shall ask for the decision of the question, but if the general judgment of the House be against it I will not press it against reason. I wish, in the first place, to state the reasons for presenting it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is it presented with the authority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. BANKS. It is. This subject has been brought to our attention very recently. It proceeds upon the theory that the two republics of Hayti and San Domingo desire the action here recommended. I am not authorized officially to state the fact that the Governments or the people of those two republics have expressed that desire. It would be manifestly wrong to make such a statement, because if it were true, and the Government of the United States should hesitate or decline to make the proffer of its protection, it would place the Governments or the citizens of those republics in an embarrassing position. But I assure the House, upon my responsibility as a member, that, according to the best information I have, such is the desire of the Governments and the people of these republics. For that reason this resolution is presented; and it is expressly stated in the resolution that unless they shall voluntarily consent to the action proposed no action whatever is to be taken in the premises.

I presented this subject to the Committee on Foreign Affairs at its last meeting before the committee was called the other day; and there was not time for a full consideration of the matter. The question is novel and of great importance, and therefore I did not ask the gentlemen of the committee to pledge themselves to the action proposed in the resolution, but simply for the authority to report the measure to the House. I received the unanimous authority of the committee to make this report, submitting a statement, as I do, of the circumstances under which it is presented.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BANKS. I will yield for an inquiry.

Mr. MULLINS. I would like three or four minutes for an expression of opinion.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that; I prefer first to submit an explanation of the action which the resolution proposes.

Mr. MULLINS. Then I will merely inquire whether this resolution is not to some extent in conflict with the great principle of non-interference with foreign Governments?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir, not in any respect whatever. No European Government has the slightest claim upon the Island of San Domingo; and the resolution does not contemplate the intervention of the Government of the United States in the slightest degree for the purpose of controlling the Government of that island. As I shall have the honor to explain as I proceed with my remarks, the resolution is only for the purpose of assisting that people in maintaining their own institutions, nothing else, and is not amenable to the objection suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MULLINS.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire that the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] shall inform the House as to the utmost possible extent of the future liability or responsibility of the United States by reason of this protectorate—this new relation proposed to be established.

Mr. BANKS. I may say that this resolution does not contemplate a protectorate in the European sense, according to which the protecting Government interferes with or controls or is in some degree responsible for the Government that is protected. Under the resolution nothing more will be required than that the United States shall, perhaps, send a vessel of war to that island, and in case of any interruption of the public peace, or any violent proceedings against the Government, to advise those parties attempting revolution that it would be better for them and their country to wait until the regular period of election should occur before they proceed against the Government. I am satisfied myself that that would be sufficient to secure the object contemplated by the resolution. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward.]

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to ask the gentleman one single question: is not the action proposed in this resolution an initial step toward those "entangling alliances" against which the Father of our Country warned us?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; it is not an initiatory step to anything except the maintenance of a good government in the Island of San Domingo by the people of the island. No foreign Government has any claim whatever upon this island. England recognized its independence in 1850; France and Denmark a little later; and all the European Powers have recognized its sovereignty. In 1865 the Spanish Cortes by a statute renounced all claim to the sovereignty of the island, so that the case stands perfectly clear from any question with regard to any foreign Government.

Mr. WOODWARD. But the question in my mind is this: if we extend our protection over what claims to be an independent, though a very feeble Government, do we not invite aggression and incur the hazard of a dispute with all the powerful nations of Europe? Is not this the very way to form an offensive alliance?

Mr. BANKS. No, Mr. Speaker, we do not by this measure invite aggression, but we take means to prevent aggression. When I state the circumstances the gentleman will see the necessity of action of this kind on the part of the United States; also the reason why these Governments should be in favor of the action proposed.

Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman yield to me for a word of explanation?

Mr. BANKS. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio if it is for an inquiry.

Mr. DELANO. No, sir; it is to explain my own position.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman will have an opportunity to do that; but I wish first to state the grounds upon which the resolution is proposed. I will yield to the gentleman from New York for an inquiry.

Mr. WARD. I should like the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to tell the House whether there is any precedent for this proposed action.

Mr. BANKS. There is no precedent for the proposed action. We are in an age when new action is required, and this is one of the instances.

Let me call the attention of the House to the facts. In 1855 Santana privately sold the Island of San Domingo to the Spanish Government for his own purposes; and the Spanish Cortes, in 1861, annexed that island of San Domingo to the Spanish Crown. That was in 1861. The rebellion against the United States had just begun. Afterward Spain sent troops to that island. Narvaez, the Spanish prime minister, was disposed after a time to withdraw the Spanish troops from the island. There was strong opposition to this policy on his part, and he was denounced for it, as the policy of Spain was in favor of the annexation. On this very question of the withdrawal of the Spanish troops from San Domingo Narvaez was driven out of the Government, and O'Donnell and his partisans came into power. This was in 1865. It was in August, after the defeat of Lee. O'Donnell, who had driven Narvaez from power because he had favored the withdrawal of Spanish troops from San Domingo, was compelled to follow the same policy, and actually did withdraw the troops. It had then been demonstrated to the world that the Government of the United States was to be maintained.

In San Domingo the president, who had only been in for a few months, was driven from power, when another one was elected for three months, or until the Spanish troops were withdrawn from the island. Before that time he was driven out and another president elected. I do not refer to all the names of these presidents, although I have them here. Revolution followed revolution in quick succession, until they have had, in the time I refer to, five or six. The reason of these constant revolutions in San Domingo is that the people have no employment which will occupy their time, which will absorb their capacity, and which will satisfy their ambition and personal interest; and, therefore, the moment that a president is elected they combine against him to oust him from power. Thus there has been revolution succeeding revolution, and so it will continue to the end of time unless some change occurs in the island.

The effect of these revolutions upon the industry of that country is shown by a letter which I received this morning from the consul of Hayti at New York—a letter, by the way, which had no reference to the subject I am now discussing and in no sense approving or disapproving this proposition. In reference to the trade of Hayti and San Domingo with the United States, he says that our trade with Hayti in 1864 was over six millions, while in 1868 it was only two millions. These exports from the United States were mainly from the West, in the shape of lumber, &c. This difference, with the character of trade, would require some two hundred vessels of the usual size trading with that country, or constant employment for some forty of the burden of two hundred tons each. The trade of San Domingo with New York alone, some years ago, was $1,500,000, while now it is not $150,000. They received our exports to the extent of $1,500,000, and now they have fallen off to less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

There seems to be nothing left for the people of this island, where a man is hardly elected president and installed in office before combinations are made to turn him out and revolution succeeds revolution, unless a protectorate is established over them. The people have nothing to do but to attend to the affairs of government. In all other countries there is an intermediate class not affected by the passions of faction. In San Domingo all the people engage in the government, and in nothing else. Recognizing this fact, the Government of Hayti, as appears from the diplomatic correspondence of our Government, appealed to the Spanish minister in 1864, as one of the great maritime Powers of Europe, to establish a protectorate for that island. The Governments of Europe refused to have anything to do with the matter unless the United States would consent thereto. But in accordance with the established policy of the country this Government refused, and has always refused, to have any connection whatever with European Powers in the management of Governments on the American continent.

Mr. JUDD. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to have him tell us whether there has been any communication of the executive department of this Government with the executive department of that island looking to this protectorate.

Mr. BANKS. I am not, as I have already said, at liberty to state the fact that there has been; but I state to the House on my own responsibility my belief that the Government and people of these republics desire this intervention, or at any rate that they will accept it. More than this I could not say without compromising both the Government and the people in the course of action proposed by this Government. In 1866, after the European states had rejected the application of Hayti for the establishment of a protectorate on the part of European Governments in this island, the Government of San Domingo made the same appeal to the Government of Spain, but that Government declared that she would maintain her power and foothold in San Domingo, and refused to receive any application on behalf of the people or the Government unless it was accompanied by an absolute surrender on the part of those who were in arms against her authority. If that was done she was willing to consider the question. But the Dominicans refused to make a surrender, and thereupon that application failed. At length, having seen for themselves that a government was necessary on their part; that revolution succeeded revolution; that trade was being diminished until it was reduced to little or nothing, it was very natural for them to look to that Power which had the ability to give them security and stability without any disposition on the part of that Power to interfere with their Government. Therefore, I may assume if they have not done this they will do it, and if we make this proffer it will be accepted by the Government and people of that country.

Now, sir, what is the proposition? Gentlemen speak of it as a protectorate, but it is not one in the European sense. The prominent protectorates which have occurred in the history of Europe are well known to gentlemen of the House. There was the protectorate which Poland gave to Cracow. There was the protectorate which for fifty years England has maintained over the republic of the Ionian Islands, which are now about to be united to the kingdom of Greece. There was the protectorate of the confederacy of the Rhine under the first Napoleon. There was the protectorate established by the treaty of Adrianople over Moldavia, Servia, and the Turkish provinces by Russia. There was the protectorate of the kingdom of Sardinia over Monaco. In these protectorates, which have been maintained by one Government and another for two hundred years, the protecting Governments in every instance have reserved influence and control over the Governments protected. In some instances they go for the maintenance of fortresses; in others, of armed forces; in others, for the control of legislation; and everywhere it looks not merely to the protection of the people under the Government, but to the control of the Government, protected by the influence and intervention of the protecting Power.

There is nothing of that kind in the action proposed in this resolution. We do not, and we cannot, without a treaty made with these Dominican Governments which shall be confirmed by the Senate, gain any foothold, acquire any territory upon that island, or interfere in any way except by way of advice to the governments there existing. Therefore it is not in the European sense a protectorate that is now proposed, but in the American sense it is a protection of the people who are, at the moment, in circumstances over which they have no control, incapable of establishing permanent government for themselves. And this proposition is not for the purpose of establishing a control over this island. What we desire is the maintenance of a just and stable government by them, one that shall be satisfactory to the people, and that shall not oblige them either to appeal to the Governments of Europe for protection or to submit to revolution after revolution three or four times in a single year, as has been the case in the few past years.

Gentlemen may say this is, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] suggests, an initiatory step by which we may get possession of the island. It is not so intended, and, Mr. Speaker, it will not result in that action. In the protectorates of Europe, to which I have referred, running over a period of two hundred years, there is not a single instance where the protectorate has resulted in giving possession of the protected to the protecting Government. England has not possession of the Ionian Islands; Poland has not possession of Cracow; Russia has not possession of the Danubian principalities; Sardinia has not possession of Monaco, and so on through the whole list of protectorates. They have not resulted at any time or anywhere in giving to the protecting Power the possession of the protected Government. On the contrary, as I have stated, in every instance there has been a release of the protected party from the influence and control of the protecting Power, and it would be so in this case.

It would be idle for me to say, Mr. Speaker, in view of the history of this country and the opinions of such men as John Quincy Adams and those who acted with him at the beginning of the century, that the time will not come when the Island of San Domingo and the other islands of the Gulf of Mexico will incline to and become a part of the United States. I cannot say it, nor do I wish to say it; but I do say that it will not and cannot result from the action proposed in this case by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The influence and effect of this action will be simply advisory, not with a view of overpowering or controlling or destroying the Governments of these people. It will be, as was said by the wise and clement emperor of Russia in regard to the protectorate on the Danube, an influence which grows out of the interest and friendship of the one party for the other. The only influence that the United States can have over Hayti and San Domingo under this proposition will be such as is incited by the friendship of the United States for those people and the friendship of those people for the United States; and if hereafter from these facts and from these motives the two Governments shall incline toward each other until they become united in one I certainly shall not make objection. But no such result can follow from the action which is proposed, and nothing of the kind is either desired or designed by either party, the people of these republics or the Government of the United States, for which I speak in this connection. It is, on the contrary, a wise, a generous, a humane proposition on the part of a great Power just having escaped destruction from a combination of all its enemies and having established within its own borders peace and good government to extend to a free and unoffending people, who have great elements of prosperity within themselves, an opportunity to do for themselves exactly what the American people in the providence of God have done for their Government. That is the object of the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have been very much interested in the statement which the gentleman has made, but I do not think he has stated very clearly exactly what this Government might be expected to do; what the protection is which this measure proposes to give. He said that we might send a ship of war down there to urge them to peace and quiet. Now, I do not see exactly how a ship of war could urge them to peace and quiet unless it was called upon to do something in the way of war. I wish he would speak more specifically as to the kind of work we might have to do in order to carry out the purpose of this measure.

Mr. BANKS. I will do it with pleasure; and, in the first place, I will say for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Ohio, what we cannot do upon any agreement with the republics of Hayti and San Domingo. We cannot take possession of their Governments, or send armed troops into their island; we cannot take possession of their territory or occupy their seas without a treaty made with them, and that treaty must be submitted for the ratification and confirmation of the Senate of the United States. We cannot, therefore, do any of those things which distinguished the protectorates of European history. What can we do, then? I refer to 1865, 1866, or 1867, when there were three revolutions in a single year; when a president was elected for three months, or until the Spanish troops could be withdrawn from the island, and was driven out of the country by revolution before even the three months had expired. If the people of Hayti or San Domingo should consent to accept the protection of the United States, and we should send a ship of war into the waters of that country by her consent or upon her application, it will be accompanied by officers of the United States. If there be a Government established there according to the constitution of that republic, proceeding in a just and proper way, without violence to anybody, and there shall be an organized revolution to overthrow that constitutional government, the officers of the United States would be authorized to advise the revolutionists to desist from their work until the period should occur when an election would afford them an opportunity to choose such man as they saw fit; and under such circumstances such advice would be accepted.

Mr. JUDD. The gentleman will allow me to ask this question: suppose the revolutionists refuse to accept that advice, what then?

Mr. BANKS. Then it is for the Government of the republic in connection with the Government of the United States to determine what ought to be done, and to submit that determination to the Senate of the United States in the shape and form of a treaty. This resolution does not give the power to the United States to enter with force of arms into that territory for the purpose of controlling that Government. It extends to those Governments the idea of protection, which may be carried under this resolution to the extent I have indicated, not requiring any appropriation of money. And if further action is required it must be upon an agreement between those Governments and the Government of the United States, and that agreement must be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification before it shall be carried into effect.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman whether it would not be well to limit this resolution, if it is to be passed at all, by adding words to the proviso. It was deemed important by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to so restrict the action of the President under this resolution as that no action should be taken which should involve the appropriation of money without first consulting the Congress of the United States. Would it not be well enough to add further words to that proviso? I would suggest the addition of these words:

And that no action shall be taken by the Executive of the United States without first consulting and obtaining the consent of Congress thereunto, which can by any possibility involve this country in a conflict of arms.

Mr. BANKS. I would cheerfully accept of such an amendment, but I am not authorized to do so myself, this being a report of a committee. But I do not object to such an amendment. We do not intend by this proposition to enter into any conflict of arms with any Power at home or abroad. What we propose is that this Government shall be authorized to extend to the people of these republics the idea of protection. Our interests and their interests are the same, and we want peace and good government there as here. Revolution succeeding revolution there destroys them and imperils the institutions of this country. If there should be a case when we would be required to enter into a contest of arms with any Government for this purpose, I submit, with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that the Congress of the United States should be first consulted before any such action shall be taken. And this resolution contemplates such a course; because any action which shall require, or seem to require, an appropriation of money shall be inaugurated under the authority of the national Legislature. I would be very glad if the idea suggested by my friend can be embodied in this resolution in a proper form, which shall not contravene the object of the resolution itself.

Mr. FERRISS. While I concur mainly in many of the views expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I do not see very clearly how this proposed protectorate can be established and made effectual with the very limited power which he proposes shall be exercised by this Government. At the same time I would ask the gentleman one question, and if he is at liberty to answer it I should be very happy to have him answer it; if not, then to say so. Did the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in determining to recommend this protectorate of these republics, regard it as a step to the ultimate annexation of these islands to the United States as a part of our territory?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; the committee had no such idea, and I had no such idea myself. I ought to say that there was not full time for the consideration of this matter by the committee, and therefore I cannot speak for the views of the members of that committee. But they authorized me to report this resolution to the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BANKS. I will yield to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. WOODWARD. I want to move that this resolution be laid on the table, in order that we may have time to examine it.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that purpose now. The gentleman will have the opportunity to make that motion; he cannot be deprived of that.

Mr. WOODWARD. Does the gentleman propose to press this resolution to a vote to-day?

Mr. BANKS. I will not say as to that. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CULLOM,] my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the understanding of the committee would not, I think, justify the gentleman in calling for a vote upon this resolution to-day.

Mr. BANKS. Very well; I do not care for a vote to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the gentleman will not press the resolution to a vote to-day, as the understanding was that we should have time to consider it after it had been reported to the House.

Mr. BANKS. I will yield for a motion to adjourn at any time.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the gentleman to allow me two or three minutes for an explanation.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman will have ample opportunity hereafter to express his views.

Mr. WARD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield for the purpose, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BANKS. I yield for that motion. If gentlemen of the House desire further time to consider this question, I am perfectly willing that an adjournment shall be had.

On the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 68, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to Indian affairs at Fort Randall, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the constitutional convention of Texas, in favor of calling into the service a regiment of Texas cavalry to repel Indian invasions; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of Mahlon Loomis, M. D., of the District of Columbia, who believes that he has invented a new mode of telegraphing, which he submits as a great and valuable improvement upon any former mode known or discovered. He briefly says:

"The nature of the discovery or invention, in general terms, consists in establishing an electrical current or circuit for telegraphing without the aid of wires or cables to form such electrical currents and circuits."

"As in dispensing with the double wire (which was at first used) and using but one, allowing and relying upon the earth to form the one half of the circuit, so now I propose to dispense with both wires and all artificial batteries, using the earth, as now, to form one half of the circuit, and the continuous electrical element far above the surface of the earth for the other part of the circuit."

After setting forth at some length his invention, or his theory, he asks Congress for an appropriation of $50,000, under such restrictions as Congress may impose, to enable him during the next year to complete the demonstration. In presenting this petition I desire to say that I perform a duty, and I content myself with remarking that it is certainly a great case of moonshine or it marks a great epoch in the progress of invention. I do not undertake to express an opinion upon it. I ask the reference of the petition to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WILLEY. I think that petition ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations. It is a matter with which the Committee on Patents has nothing to do.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a subject intimately connected with those great telegraphic movements which are now in operation. We have had one question of that sort referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations since this session commenced; and I trust this petition, instead of being referred to the Committee on Appropriations, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not understand the name of the petitioner. Was it given? Let the name be read, for I want him to have the benefit of it, whoever he is.

The CHIEF CLERK. The petition is signed "Mablon Loomis, M. D."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Patents, and the Senator from West Virginia moves that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SUMNER. I think if my friend from West Virginia had read the petition he would have seen that it undertakes to set forth an invention, and I think that the Committee on Patents is the most competent of any in our body to consider the value of the invention.

Mr. WILLEY. It is not an application, as I understand it, for a patent or anything of that character.

Mr. SUMNER. But it is for an appropriation, which will be a substitute for a patent.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It strikes me the Committee on Patents has nothing to do with a claim of that character.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this petition will be sent to the Committee on Patents. I do not know that there is anything in the invention; probably there is not; but it is not worth our while to meet any propositions of this kind with a sneer. The world laughed at all the great inventions which have been made when they were first proposed. It is only a few years ago since the first men of this nation sneered and laughed at the magnetic telegraph, but the telegraph triumphed. Now, there may be something in this, and I hope that the papers will be sent to the proper committee, and that they will examine the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope Senators will not think from any remarks I have made that I sneered at this improvement. I believe in it. I have seen two or three experiments, and I think there is something in it. I have seen it tested in a small way, and I am inclined to think it will succeed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be first put on the motion to refer to the committee first named. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that this petition be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Charles Carlett, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Patrick Moore, praying to be allowed a bounty of $100, which he alleges to be due his son, Thomas Moore, late a private of company H, one hundred and fifty-first regiment New York volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of F. H. Hill, praying a removal of the disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of the curators of the Kentucky University, praying compensation for the destruction by fire of the medical college known as Transylvania University, at Lexington, Kentucky, in May, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS presented the memorial of Samtel Jamison, praying compensation for property taken possession of by order of Major General BUTLER while commanding the military forces at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Thomas C. Anderson, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Isaac H. Crawford, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress, and praying the removal of the civil disabilities imposed on John Ward, Leroy S. Ward, and A. T. Osborn; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of Theogene Castille, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of the yearly meeting of Progressive Friends, at Longwood, Chester county, Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of a humane policy toward the Indians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of Jonathan K. Hodges, praying that a bounty be granted to his wife for services rendered by Charles Jones in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 729) to provide for the execution in the District of Columbia of commissions issued by the courts of the States and Territories of the United States and of foreign nations, and for taking depositions to be used in such courts, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1489) granting a portion of the military reservation at Sault Ste. Marie to the American Baptist Home Mission Society, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the petition of C. Anderson Hullquist in behalf of the poor of Sweden, submitted an adverse report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, on the 14th of December last, on the expediency of authorizing a committee of five on education, reported the resolution favorably.

TRANSFER OF PRINTING APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 194) authorizing the transfer of certain appropriations heretofore made for the public printing, binding, and engraving, have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration. It is a thing to which there will be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the sum of $194,000 to be transferred from the appropriation "for paper for the public printing," contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869," approved on the 20th of July, 1868, in aid of the appropriations contained in the same act for the following purposes and in the following proportions, to wit: for the public binding, the sum of $110,000; for lithographing and engraving for the Senate and House of Representatives, the sum of $84,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 767) to incorporate the Washington General Hospital and Asylum of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ABBOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 768) for the relief of Mrs. Jane Northridge; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 769) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Rio Grande to the Pacific ocean; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 770) to incorporate the National Gold and Silver Mining Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAWYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 771) authorizing payment to be made for certain services rendered to the United States in the late insurrectionary States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKALEW asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 772) to amend the representation of the people in Congress; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUCKALEW. As the bill is very short, I ask that it be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That in the elections for the choice of Representatives to the Congress of the United States, whenever more than one Representative is to be chosen from a State each elector of such State duly qualified shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of Representatives to be chosen from the State and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them equally or unequally among a greater number of candidates, and the candidates highest in vote upon the return shall be declared elected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to permit this bill to be referred to a select committee. I make the motion that this bill be referred to a select committee of seven, of whom the President pro tempore shall be one.

The motion was agreed to.

OREGON BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some days ago I introduced a bill (S. No. 660) to aid in the construction of the Oregon Branch Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I now propose to offer an amendment to that bill, which I will ask to have printed and referred to the same committee; and I desire to say, in connection with this amendment, that the original bill provided for subsidies according to the laws heretofore passed upon that subject, but this amendment provides, instead of such subsidies, that the Government shall guaranty the interest upon the bonds of the company, and those bonds shall be a first mortgage lien upon the road. To secure the Government it is provided that the proceeds of all the lands shall remain in the Treasury of the United States, and the proceeds of all the business transacted by the road for the Government, shall also remain in the Treasury; and if those proceeds are found to be insufficient, then it provides that three per cent. of the gross proceeds of the road after its completion shall be paid into the Treasury for that purpose. A sinking fund is also provided for by which the bonds will be paid at the expiration of six years, this providing for forty-year bonds at six per cent. It is also provided that if there is any failure to perform the requirements of this law by the company the Government may take possession of the road and appoint a receiver for the purpose of protecting itself. I ask the attention of Senators to this amendment; I think it will be found to obviate all the objections that have heretofore been made to the assistance by the Government to railroad enterprises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

LIGHT-HOUSES ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. CORBETT. Before the adjournment for the holidays I offered a resolution providing for the selection of points upon the Pacific coast necessary for light-houses. I presume there will be no objection to it; and I move now to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. CORBETT on the 21st of December, 1868:

Resolved, That the President direct the Secretary of the Treasury to detail an officer to select such prominent points upon the coasts of Oregon, Washington Territory, and Alaska, as in his judgment may be necessary, for light-house purposes, in view of the future commercial necessity of the Pacific coast, and to reserve the same for the exclusive use of the United States.

The resolution was agreed to.

W. T. COGGESHALL.

Mr. SUMNER. There is on the Calendar a little bill which I reported yesterday from the Committee on Foreign Relations, for the removal of the remains of the late Mr. Coggeshall, minister at Ecuador. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 967) to provide for the removal of the remains of Hon. W. T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, to the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of State to provide for the removal of the body of Hon. William T. Coggeshall, late minister of the United States at Ecuador, to the United States, and that of his daughter; and to appropriate a sum not exceeding $1,000 to defray the expense of the removal, and also $1,000 for the relief of the family of the deceased W. T. Coggeshall.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is exceedingly unpleasant for Senators having no connection with the committees reporting bills to rise here and object to bills that are founded on charity or bounty, or any such consideration; and if it were not that this sets a precedent I certainly should not rise on this occasion. I believe this is the first instance of the kind in our history, and I am reluctant that it shall go on our records as a precedent. I am rather inclined to occupy the position of one of the old Virginia abstractionists who died here and with something of emphasis declared that he would not be buried at the public expense, for it was not constitutional.

Now, Mr. President, if this bill shall pass the result will be that a claim will be presented here for charging upon the Government the expense of the burial of every person who hereafter may die in the service of the country abroad. I do not know but that there are—and I presume there are—peculiar circumstances which recommend this bill to the heart of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but whenever a subsequent bill comes up here those circumstances will not be appealed to, but only the simple fact that such a personage died on such an occasion and that his funeral expenses and the charge of bringing the body home were defrayed by the Government of the United States. If they may be defrayed in the case of a minister abroad, why not for a consul? and if for a consul, why not for a Navy officer? It will certainly be seen that this is a precedent which cannot be met without danger. I trust that it is enough to bring the subject to the attention of the Senate to lead them to refuse to vote for the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senate desires to hear anything on the subject. I agree with my friend that this case is exceptional. I doubt whether it can be drawn hereafter into a precedent. Indeed it can be a precedent only in similar circumstances, and it is not likely that the circumstances will occur again. They were peculiar. The situation of the remains of this unfortunate gentleman, who died representing us abroad, at this moment is very peculiar, and his family are absolutely without means. Under those circumstances an appeal was made to the Department of State, and then to the generosity of Congress. The other House has yielded to that appeal. The whole case is stated in a letter from Mr. SHELLABARGER, of the other House, which is addressed to myself, and with the permission of the Senate I will read it:

HOUSE, January 8, 1869.

SENATOR: Pardon me for asking you, as head of the Foreign Committee, to favor, if you can, the House bill just passed, giving to the family of our late minister at Ecuador, William T. Coggeshall, $1,000, and providing for bringing home the bodies of the deceased minister and of his daughter. The facts will appear in the debates of to-morrow's Globe; but to save you the labor of reading them may I state them to you? Mr. Coggeshall was a man of influence; long an editor, and valuable friend all his life of our cause; was in 1856 sent, in bad health, to Ecuador, was accompanied by his child Jessie, aged fifteen, but singularly mature, intelligent, and beautiful. She soon obtained the Spanish language, became the interpreter and secretary to the legation, and the nurse of her sick father; did most of the business of the mission, did it well, and under most fearful hardships aided in procuring (as her father did) those rights of Protestant burial which you remember were temporarily accorded to our people, and buried her father in the cemetery among the first ever so interred in Quito.

After her father's death, (and it is for this we beg your favorable consideration of the bill,) she continued at Quito, took care of, preserved, and had rightly disposed of the books and papers belonging to the Government, and remained there four or five months, namely, from August, 1857, the date of her father's death, until January, 1858. She then started home, traveling several hundred miles through mountains &c., on mules, and, after great suffering, reached the coast at Guayaquil, wheresh she was taken with yellow fever and died. The body of the father has been, by the revolutionary party there, taken up and put into a public warehouse. The salary drawn was only for about fifteen months, and was far less than the actual expense of the mission. The family is absolutely destitute, there being left a widow and a large family of little children. As the $1,000 voted by the House is far less than the value of the four months' service actually rendered by Jessie, I sincerely trust you may find right to give the bill your indispensable favor.

Yours, very truly,

S. SHELLABARGER.

Hon. C. SUMNER, Senate.

This letter was read to the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday; and I believe I may say that, taking it into consideration they recognized the case as absolutely exceptional, and unanimously voted that the bill should be reported to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it is necessary to add a word to the statement already made; but there is one fact which, if improved upon in the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, I think will save all the money here appropriated and several times more. I will never consent myself to appropriate anything to pay for a minister at Ecuador, owing to the circumstances which occurred at the death of Mr. Coggeshall. He was denied Christian burial, and his body is now in a public warehouse and his family are not able to bring his remains here. The circumstances are peculiar. It seems to me that not only ought we to pay this money, but we ought to refuse to have any intercourse of a diplomatic character with a nation that would deny to a Protestant Christian a Christian burial.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any doubt of the fact of the poverty of the family?

Mr. SHERMAN. None at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion by Mr. POMEROY,

Ordered, That George E. Glenn have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

SUITS IN THE REBEL STATES.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1261. I think it will take but a short time to pass it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1261) amendatory of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill has been engrossed and read the third time, and the question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended in the Senate on the 25th of July last, as follows:

That the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, so far as the same relate to the removal of causes from the State to the Federal courts, be, and the same is hereby declared to extend to any suit or action at law or prosecution, civil or criminal, which has been or shall be commenced in any State court against the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or of any railway, or of any line of transportation, firm, or corporation engaged in business as common carriers of goods, wares, or merchandise, for any loss or damage which may have happened to any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, which shall have been delivered to any such owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or any railway, or of any line of transportation, firm, or corporation, engaged in business as common carriers, where such loss or damage shall have been occasioned by the acts of those engaged in hostility to the Government of the United States during the late rebellion, or where such loss or damage shall have been occasioned by any of the forces of the United States, or by any officer in command of such forces: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to affect any contract of insurance for war risks which may have been made with reference to any goods, wares, or merchandise which shall have been so destroyed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill. It is very difficult to understand its scope and effect simply from its reading.

Mr. CAMERON. This bill was very fully discussed just before the adjournment last summer, and would have passed then but for want of time. It is merely a bill to save wrong to express companies and other transportation companies that existed in the South. The bill only provides that they shall have the right to carry their suits into the United States courts. It is designed to protect the loyal people who have invested their money in transportation companies in the South from the dangers of local juries. Everybody, I take it, will see that it is a bill that ought to pass.

Mr. COLE. I was not able to hear all that was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania in favor of this bill; but I remember that a bill of a similar character was brought before the Senate at the last session to transfer suits against corporations in State courts to the United States courts. It seems to me a bad practice. It will preclude parties having certain rights or claims against these corporations from the possibility of getting justice speedily if they are to be transferred to the United States courts. It is well understood that the State courts are the handiest always, and I do not know why these corporations cannot obtain justice there as well as in the United States courts. Unless there is some good, sound reason for this bill, which I am not advised of, I certainly feel like voting against it.

Mr. CONKLING. If Senators will give their attention for one moment to the only point involved in this bill I think no valid objection will arise in any mind. It comes from this state of facts in the southern States, and particularly in the State of Georgia; my attention has been called to cases there more than in any single State. Express companies and others, the stockholders living in the loyal States, are sued for property of which they were deprived by the rebel forces. They wish to raise the question whether that was the act of a public enemy so as to exempt them as common carriers, upon well-settled principles of law, from liability. The courts of Georgia do not merely rule against them, but they decline to make any ruling upon which an exception can be taken upon this question of law, and submit the case to the jury as a question of fact, virtually as a question of damages; and thus juries sitting in State courts find upon a mere question of quantum meruit, a mere question of how much was the value of the goods for which suits are brought. The purpose and effect of the bill is to enable defendants thus sued, where they find it necessary to do so in order to raise the question, to transfer to the Federal courts such actions as have for their defense the allegation that the public enemy destroyed the goods, to the end that that question may go to the Supreme Court to see whether it falls within the principles decided in the prize cases and in other cases or not. They insist that the war was of such a character and such dimensions that at common law they defend themselves when they show that the embodied power of the rebellion deprived them of the goods as much as if they had fallen into the hands, literally, of a public enemy—a foreign nation with whom we were at war. That question, at all events, they want to raise. That question they are not permitted to raise even as they might, in southern tribunals, by the fact that they encounter a refusal altogether to rule upon it as a question of law, and they encounter instructions from judges under which the case goes as a question of fact to the jury. Of course, we all agree that there should be some mode of ascertaining, and ascertaining in the court of last resort, this problem of liability; and unless some Senator can suggest a better mode of doing it than this I do not see how any objection is to be made to the bill.

Mr. COLE. I suppose the same reason would apply to the suits or actions brought against private individuals in the same portion of the Union. The same argument would hold good on their behalf.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me one moment there, he will perceive that it would not, for the reason that a common carrier is a special person. He becomes the insurer of all goods taken into his possession against every possible contingency, except the act of the public enemy and the act of God. Therefore, aimed at common carriers, and at common carriers alone, is this class of actions.

Mr. COLE. I suppose actions involving the same principles, actions involving the question whether property was destroyed by the public enemy, may arise on behalf of individuals in that section of the country, and I have no doubt they suffer like disadvantages with the express companies or other corporations; and I do not think it well to make an exception in favor of these express companies or large corporations which is not to be enjoyed by private citizens less able to take care of themselves.

Mr. CONKLING. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I ask him to allow me to make one other suggestion. If a private person is sued as a bailee the defense must be by showing diligence. He is mulcted in damages only in case he has been guilty of negligence. Therefore, no such question arises with him. But a common carrier, to defend himself, must show either that the act of God, technically, or the act of the public enemy, as defined by law, occasioned the loss.

Mr. COLE. Still common carriers are only one class of bailees. There are other classes to which I do not suppose the rule would apply, and there ought not to be any exception in favor of large corporations and companies which are engaged in business as common carriers, and as such are bailees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not have the honor to be present when this bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, nor when it was considered. It is brought to my attention now for the first time. Grave difficulties occur to my mind touching our constitutional right to pass a bill of this description removing causes, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties, from the courts of a State to the Federal courts, if this bill permits it, as on a hasty reading it appears to me to do.

Mr. CAMERON. That is not the case. The stockholders of these companies reside, as a general thing, in the North. It is a mere question whether they shall have the right to appeal to the United States courts as corporations or not. Many suits are brought against them, and it is important for their interests that it should be decided immediately whether they shall have this right or not. It can do no harm, as I understand, to anybody. I feel a desire to pass the bill because a number of my constituents are very largely interested in it. As I have said, they only ask the right to go to an impartial tribunal, and they cannot have an impartial decision in the State courts as they are now organized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing would gratify me more than to accede to the wishes of my friend from Pennsylvania, or to see that all his constituents have fair and impartial justice; but I feel compelled, on a bill of this kind, which involves, as it seems to me, a wide departure from any previous practice of the Government, and to my humble apprehension a very wide departure from the Constitution, to express my respectful dissent, as anxious as I am to have the citizens of Pennsylvania have justice in all courts, and the citizens of Vermont, I should hope, would have the same justice; although as to some of them, and possibly it is so in Pennsylvania, it would not be to their advantage to have justice. I do not doubt there is a grievance. That is not the point to which I rise. I dare say that wrong is committed, systematic wrong; I may confess, upon these persons in the southern States; but those are wrongs which are incidental to the existing condition of things, and we ought not to violate the Constitution, nor any just and settled principle of practice under that Constitution, in order to redress them. This bill does not provide that the parties who are to remove these cases from the State courts shall be citizens of other States from the plaintiff who brings the action in the State court. It declares that the removing provisions of the habeas corpus bill, which extended only to acts done under the authority of the United States, and therefore came under the provisions of the Constitution, such as have always existed in one form or other, shall extend—

To any suit or action at law and prosecution, civil or criminal, which has been or shall be commenced in any State court against the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or of any railway, or of any line of transportation, firm, or corporation engaged in business as common carriers.

It is not limited to citizens of other States from the States whose courts undertake to exercise jurisdiction.

Mr. CONKLING. Was the original act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What original act?

Mr. CONKLING. The act which this bill amends.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. The original act was limited by the subject, and the subject was not the subject of common carriers, but it was the subject of acts done under the authority of a law of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to obtain a little information from him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Will he be kind enough to point out, as a jurisdictional question, the distinction between an action brought under the Constitution or laws of the United States, as those of which he is speaking, and an action the defense of which arises exclusively under the same authority?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to point out any such distinction if it exists. I do not say that it does. That is not the point I am making at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if the honorable Senator will pardon me, perhaps I do not understand him. If no such distinction exists, I do not see why, by parity and identity of reasoning, if we can allow parties who have actions arising under the laws of the United States to transfer them, we may not allow defendants whose defenses arise in the same way to transfer the action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to dispute that proposition. That is exactly the proposition which is in the existing law, the habeas corpus act, which allows any person who defends under the authority of the United States, under the command of an order of the President of the United States or any of the Departments—I may not express it in exact detail as it is, but that is the substance of it—when he is sued in a State court, to remove that cause into the United States court, upon the ground that he is to defend under the authority of Congress. Nobody disputes that proposition. If this bill proposed to do anything of that kind, it would be one thing; but as I say, in the first place, the class of persons who are authorized to remove causes under the authority of this bill are not the class of persons referred to in the Constitution or in any previous law. They are neither citizens of other States, although they might be by accident, some of them or all of them—that is not the ground upon which the bill puts it—nor are they officers or other persons acting under the authority of the United States, and who, therefore, would be entitled to have redress and defense in a Federal court. They are common carriers, persons engaged in private enterprises for their own profit, and it authorizes them to remove all suits against them arising out of their business as carriers—"where such loss or damage shall have been occasioned by the acts of those engaged in hostility to the Government of the United States." What has that to do with the Constitution?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me right there—

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my honorable friend will wait until I get through, he will have an opportunity to address the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I wanted just at that point to get an answer to the question I put before. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be through in a minute. I will give my friend an answer after I have finished commenting on this particular clause of the bill.

Now, I repeat, as I was going on to say when my friend interrupted me, and which I do not complain of at all, that the active clause of this bill, the subject of it, is defenses to suits brought where the loss or damage was occasioned by persons hostile to the United States. Is that under the authority of the United States? Is that under the authority of any provision in the Constitution? Is the defense to be set up under any law of Congress? By no means. But the defense is—and it is a good one everywhere if you could have justice in State courts and from State juries—that the loss incurred by the common carrier happened through the act of the public enemy; and a rebellion of the proportions that this one was must certainly come within that definition. So nobody questions that these companies, under the circumstances named in the bill, have a defense to the suit; but the question is, whether, as citizens of the United States or citizens of any particular State, they must not seek their redress and make their defense in those tribunals that the Constitution has appointed for them. That is the question; and to my humble apprehension the Constitution of the United States, which points out most carefully and most explicitly the class of cases in which the Federal courts are authorized to interfere, denies to these persons, as hard and as unfortunate as it may be from local circumstances, the right to remove their suits, or to prosecute them in the Federal courts, because they are not citizens of different States; because the defense that they wish to make does not arise under the authority of any law of Congress or the Constitution, but arises under a principle as old as the common law is, and that is, simply, that the carrier has lost his goods because a public enemy or the act of God intervened; and that is the whole of his defense that is referred to in this bill. Now, what have the Federal courts to do with such a question as that, any more than the State courts?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the order of the day, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator who has the unfinished business in charge to let it lay aside informally until we dispose of this bill, or at least until I can make a remark which will vanish unless I make it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business can be laid aside informally, if there be no objection. No objection being made, the Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg, now, to direct the attention of the honorable Senator from Vermont to the point which, because he was somewhat impatient of interruption, I was not able to bring clearly to his own apprehension and to my own. He makes no objection to an act of Congress operating upon citizens of the same State which allows one of the parties to set up as a defense an act done under the laws of the United States. That proposition he clearly conceded, and that proposition I think it is too late for any lawyer to deny. What I sought to present to him was this: the fact to be set up by these defendants is not the military disorder at all. On the contrary, it is a complex fact, a complex defense, a large part of which must be made out by the laws and the Constitution of the United States. The Senator will see that such a defense at once gives rise to the question which has been so largely discussed in Miss Sue Murphey's case, what were the dimensions, what was the character of the war? There the Constitution of the United States comes in; there acts of Congress come in; there enabling acts vesting the President with power to do what he did come in; and thus you see that while it is not technically the case already provided for, of an officer or a citizen acting under the authority of the United States, and therefore permitted to defend himself in the courts of the United States even against a citizen of his own State, it is still the case of a defense arising partially or totally under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The honorable Senator says the simple question was whether he lost his property in consequence of the interposition of the public enemy. Certainly; but how is that question to be determined? By ascertaining the character of that enemy; by ascertaining whether, in truth, he was pro hac vice a public enemy, so as at common law to exempt a common carrier deprived by his interposition of his goods. How do you arrive at that? By appealing to the whole body of the laws which we have passed governing the question; appealing first, to the Constitution of the United States, and, second, to all the exercised powers of Congress derived in that regard from that Constitution.

Now, I beg to ask the honorable Senator again what the distinction is in point of principle? Under the laws as they stand one party is sued for an arrest. If he can spell a defense out of the laws of the United States he is permitted to transfer his cause to the courts of the United States. That case does not, technically, embrace this. Here is a party about to be visited with what he says is charged by the laws of the United States from a liability into a calamity for which he is not to blame. May he not go into the Federal courts and set up by the same reasoning his defense; and if not, why not? Certainly not to my apprehension for any reason assigned by the honorable Senator from Vermont.

I agree with him that it is the accident of these cases that the parties upon whom, in truth, this is to operate are citizens of different States. The bill is not confined to that, and therefore upon such a demurrer as he makes to it we are bound to consider it as a bill operating upon citizens of the same State, opposing parties to the same litigation; and confining it, as he does now, for the purpose of testing this question, to that case, I repeat again, as it seemed to me in committee, that I see no reason for saying that we have not the power to allow these parties to set up their defense, under the laws and Constitution of the United States, in the same forum into which we have invited parties whose defense no more arises under the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 23, nays 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us have another division.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a quorum here; let us divide again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a matter of importance, and I call for the yeas and nays. We shall get a quorum in that way.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. If this bill is going to lead to further debate I must insist on the order of the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection to the vote being taken if the Senate is ready to vote; but if it is to lead to further debate, I think I ought to insist upon the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the order of the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to debate the bill; but I wish to ask the Senator from New York, who seems to understand it, for a little further information. According to the bill, provision is made that the act relating to the habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases, approved March 3, 1863, "so far as relates to removal of causes from the State to the Federal courts, be and the same is hereby declared to extend to any suit or action at law, or prosecution, civil or criminal," &c. The act to which this bill refers provides for certain proceedings to remove a cause, which are inapplicable to a case described in this bill. According to that law a person who has performed an act under the authority of the United States, if he is sued in a State court, may go before that court, and by petition representing that fact, to which is appended his affidavit, he may remove the cause into a Federal court. Now, what sort of petition or affidavit is a person who is sued under the provisions of this bill to make under that statute? It seems to me the statute is inapplicable, and the bill will be inoperative if it is passed. I only desire information from the Senator from New York on the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. I had no very special understanding of this bill, except that many persons in the State of New York are interested in it, having suffered very much in the way I have described. My understanding is that the petition in this case would set forth, in the language of the bill, that such loss or damage has been occasioned by the acts of those engaged in hostility to the Government of the United States during the late rebellion, or that the loss was occasioned by the forces of the United States or an officer in command of such forces. I understand that would be the gravamen of the petition in this case, as under the original bill the gravamen of the petition has usually been that the acts were done under the warrant or order of the President of the United States.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bucklew, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Whyte—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, McCree, Norton, Trumbull, Williams, and Wilson—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Chandler, Conness, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Tipton, Warner, Welch, Willey, and Yates—24.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. F. A. PIERCE, of Maine; Mr. T. E. STEWART, of New York; and Mr. STEVENSON ARCHER, of Maryland, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1673) to relieve William H. Bagley, of Wake county, North Carolina, of his political disabilities.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That so much of the Capitol as is hereinafter mentioned be granted to the committee of control in which to conduct the inaugural proceedings, other than official, of President and Vice President, on the 4th of March next, to wit: the Rotunda, the old Hall of Representatives, the Senate corridors and Senate public reception room, the passages leading thence to the Rotunda and old Hall, and so much of the basement not used by the committees as may be required; the Senate Chamber, Hall of Representatives, committee-rooms, and all other parts of the building to be closed to the public, except the east entrance to the Senate; the occupation not to take place until after the official inauguration, and the building to remain all the time in charge of and under the control of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses of Congress.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating an estimate of appropriation for fulfilling treaty stipulations with certain bands of Ute Indians, under treaty of 2d March, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1673) to relieve William H. Bagley, of Wake county, North Carolina, of his political disabilities, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama. That bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to interrupt the Senator from Oregon for a single moment. A week ago I presented resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Vermont in relation to the subject of reciprocity in trade with the British provinces, and not being disposed at that time to interrupt the business of the Senate, I gave notice that I would call up those resolutions to-day at one o'clock for the purpose of occupying the time of the Senate with some remarks in relation to them; and I supposed then that I had the acquiescence of the Senate in that course. I supposed it would be agreeable to the Senate to hear me to-day. Now, I desire either to have the case of Sue Murphey go over until to-morrow or to have an understanding that to-morrow after the business of the morning hour I shall have the floor upon those resolutions. I am willing to give way now with the understanding that I shall have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. POMEROY. When there is an understanding I should like to know who are parties to it. I found the other day that we got into difficulty because a few individuals had made some sort of understanding among themselves about the floor and those in my vicinity did not know anything about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This was an arrangement made a week ago, when I supposed the Sue Murphey case would be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to say much upon a bill that has been so exhaustively discussed as the bill now before the Senate. I have been familiar with this case from the time it was presented to Congress, and I have found some difficulty in reaching a satisfactory conclusion. My sympathies are all on one side, while the dictates of my judgment lead me to the other side. I have no doubt whatever as to the law of this case. If Sue Murphey could bring a suit against the United States to recover the value of the property taken as described in her bill, under the law of nations and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States it is perfectly clear that she would be defeated. Any court would be bound to hold that under the circumstances of this case no legal liability attached to the Government. When the rebellion broke out the eleven States concerned, as organized political bodies, combined together and formed a confederate government; each State also had a separate and independent government; and these organized political bodies, as States, made war upon the Federal Government. Citizens residing within the jurisdiction of these de facto governments partook of their character; and if they were belligerent toward the United States the citizens under those governments occupied the same attitude.

Objection is made to this view of the case on the ground that certain persons who reside within the rebel States entered into the Union Army and fought for the Government of the Union; but that objection has no force to weaken the law applicable to the question. Suppose that a war should occur between the United States and Great Britain, and an army of this country should invade Canada, and certain citizens of that portion of the British empire should attach themselves to the American Army, would that fact prove that the United States had not a perfect legal right to treat the citizens of Canada as enemies to the United States on the ground that the Government within whose jurisdiction they resided and the country in which they lived were at war with this country? Congress might, under such circumstances, extend any favor it saw proper, to any individual or individuals in the Army of the United States invading Canada, but it would be altogether a matter of grace; but if in the judgment of the authorities of this country it was necessary for the purpose of prosecuting the war to treat all the citizens of that country as enemies, there is no doubt, as it seems to me, upon the law of nations, that this Government would have a right to pursue that course. All that Congress may do favorable or friendly to the people of the rebel States, as I have always contended since the rebellion was conquered, is a matter of favor; and I have denied and do deny that the citizens of that portion of the country, those who were under the confederate States government, and citizens of the so-called confederate States during the war, have any right to demand anything at the hands of the Government of this country. All our proceedings from the beginning of the war up to the restoration of these States go upon that ground. When General Grant bombarded Vicksburg he made no distinction between the loyal and disloyal inhabitants of that city; all alike were killed; all alike had their property destroyed; not because it was desirable to pursue that course, but because the imperious necessities of war required that policy to be pursued in order to secure triumph to the Union arms.

When Congress proceeded to reorganize these rebel States it provided military governments for each one of them by which the constitutional rights that citizens of this country enjoyed elsewhere were denied to the people of those States. Nobody, it seems to me, can claim that this property was protected by that clause of the Constitution which says that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, for all the provisions of the Constitution, that as well as others, that as well as those provisions securing the right of trial by jury or the right to the writ of habeas corpus, were inoperative in that locality, and it was left to the absolute discretion of the men who commanded our armies to kill such persons and destroy such property as in their judgment was necessary to conquer the rebellion and restore the authority of the United States. Inter arma silent leges is a rule as old as organized government; and if there ever was a time and place where that rule ought to obtain it was in the rebel States when they were carrying forward a gigantic war for the purpose of overthrowing the Government and destroying the integrity of this country.

When the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] propounded a question yesterday to this effect, ought not a loyal person in the State of Alabama whose property is taken for the purposes of this war to be paid in the same way as a person in the State of New York whose property is taken for the purposes of this war under the same circumstances? It was said that the inquiry suggested a conclusive argument in support of this claim. Now, sir, I make this answer: no property could be taken in the State of New York during the rebellion for war purposes under the same circumstances as property was taken in the State of Alabama for such purposes. The fallacy lies in the unfounded assumption that the circumstances attending property in the State of New York were like the circumstances surrounding property in the State of Alabama. Property in the State of New York was under the protection of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, while property in the State of Alabama, in consequence of the rebellion, was not under the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States. When, therefore, property in the State of New York was taken by the Government for the purpose of prosecuting the war, a legal liability attached to the Government to pay for that property; but when property was taken in the State of Alabama, a State at war with the Federal Government, no such legal liability attached.

Moreover, sir, it is to be remembered that the citizens of the State of New York contributed of their money in the shape of taxes and otherwise to the support of the Government in the prosecution of the war; every person in the State of New York was compelled by law to contribute to the prosecution of the war; while in the State of Alabama every citizen contributed to the rebellion against the Government. Law could take the property of citizens of New York, in the shape of taxes and otherwise to maintain the Government, while every cent which the Government obtained in the State of Alabama to support its cause was necessarily obtained by force of arms.

Assuming, then, Mr. President, that the Constitution of the country and the laws of nations do not impose any legal obligation upon the Federal Government to pay for this property, I ask how does the claim stand upon other grounds? While I was a member of the Committee on Claims I was made the organ of that committee to reject a claim which I will now describe. Somewhere in the State of Virginia, I think near the city of Norfolk, a woman who was a true Union woman was suspected by the rebels of conveying valuable information to the Union Army, in consequence of which her husband was killed, her house and furniture were burned by the rebels, and she and her little family were turned homeless and penniless upon the world. She made application to Congress to pay her for her house and furniture, so that she might have something with which to assist in supporting herself and her dependent family, but it was the unanimous judgment of the committee that the claim could not be recognized. Every one can see that to have recognized that claim would have opened a door to millions upon millions of claims against the Government of the United States. I affirm, however, that every argument which has been adduced here to support the claim of Sue Murphey can be adduced to support the claim of this Virginia woman. One is, and I believe it is the one upon which the Senator from Wisconsin chiefly relies, that the Government of the United States is bound to protect its citizens. Was not this Virginia woman a citizen of the United States? Was not the Government as much bound to protect and preserve her property as to protect and preserve the property of any other citizen in the rebel States? Manifestly, if the correctness of the claim in question be put upon that ground, it would require the Government to pay the claim of this Virginia woman and all similar claims, for the Government did not protect her in the possession of her property, notwithstanding she was a citizen of the United States.

Another argument that has been adduced here, and it has been repeated with very many impressive embellishments, is that the loyal people of the South, in view of the circumstances by which they were surrounded, are entitled not only to praise but to favor at the hands of the Government. Now, sir, I ask if any case can be found where a woman in the southern States displayed more heroism and more devotion to the country than this Virginia woman; and though conspicuous in that respect her claim was unanimously rejected by the Committee on Claims.

Something has been said about the circumstances of Miss Sue Murphey for the purpose of commending her to the favorable consideration of the Senate; but if she, a young and handsome woman, it may be without property, but with other bright prospects in life, is entitled to the sympathy of the Senate, how much stronger is the claim of that afflicted and penniless widow with her children dependent on her for support? No appeal to sympathy was of any avail in that case.

Some effort has been made to create a distinction between property deliberately taken and property taken in another way for the purpose of prosecuting the war. I think that is a distinction without a difference. Suppose while General Grant was investing the city of Vicksburg it was necessary to tear down houses or destroy fields of grain in order to erect his batteries, was that property deliberately taken? Suppose that the Union Army during the war were compelled to cut down forests for the purpose of supplying themselves with fuel, was that property deliberately taken? Suppose that in the pursuit of or retreat from the enemy the Union Army was compelled to seize horses, wagons, boats, or other means of conveyance, was that property deliberately taken? Many railroads in the southern States, millions of dollars' worth, I presume, of railroad property in the southern States was destroyed by the Union armies to prevent the retreat or the pursuit of a rebel force. Was that property deliberately destroyed or not?

Sir, no distinction of that nature can be made between the different kinds of property and the circumstances under which it was taken and destroyed. Pass this bill and put it upon that ground and you open a door to the Treasury which can never be closed until the nation is brought to the verge of hopeless bankruptcy.

Millions of property were destroyed in the South by means of the emancipation proclamation. Slaves were as much property in law as horses and cattle. Suppose that a Union man whose whole property was invested in slaves joined the Union Army and was killed in battle and the emancipation proclamation left his widow and children without a cent in the world; is not that a case where property was deliberately taken by the Government, and are not the circumstances such as to appeal to our warmest sympathies? It has been by a constitutional amendment declared that no compensation shall be made to those who were slaveholders in the South for the emancipation of their slaves; and from that I argue that the people of this country have decided this question. They have decided that there is to be no distinction between loyal and disloyal people in the South as to their claims, for that constitutional amendment cuts off the claims of loyal men to their property in the same way as it destroys the claim of disloyal men to their property in the southern States. That question has been presented to the people of this country, and they have deliberately affirmed the doctrine that there shall be no recognition of such claims by the General Government. I know a distinction can be made on moral grounds between that and other kinds of property; but there were loyal men in the South and loyal families who suffered as much in consequence of the emancipation of their slaves as Sue Murphey suffered by the destruction of her house.

It has been said, for the purpose of producing effect I suppose, that to reject this claim is to treat the petitioner and others who stand upon the same ground as public enemies. Sir, I deny the correctness of that proposition. I sympathize with the loyal people of the South who have suffered in consequence of this rebellion. I am willing to go as far as I reasonably can to repair the losses which they have sustained; but when I say to Sue Murphey that I cannot vote for her claim I simply say to her that she must abide by the calamities and misfortunes of the war that have fallen upon her as the orphans and widows, childless fathers and mothers of the North, must abide by afflictions brought upon them by the war.

That is all that is said in refusing to pay this claim. War was raging in the State of Alabama, and Sue Murphey suffered by the presence of that war like thousands of other people everywhere in every part of the southern States; and to reject this claim is simply to affirm that she must abide by the circumstances in which this wicked and unhappy war left her and the other people of this country.

Sir, how stands the account? Compare the sacrifices and sufferings of the loyal States for the Government with the sacrifices and sufferings made by the disloyal States for the same purpose during the war. More than a million men were taken from active labor and from their usual avocations in the North and put into the field to fight the battles for the Government, while low down in the thousands may be found the number of those in the disloyal States who assisted in fighting those battles. More than two hundred thousand brave men who entered the Army from the northern States now sleep in bloody graves, who fell in fighting the battles of the country, while comparatively few sleep by their sides who enlisted into the Army from the southern States. Look at the contributions of means and money made during the existence of the war; compare the millions and tens of millions that were poured into the public Treasury from the northern States with the amount that was put into the public Treasury from the States arrayed in hostility to the Government. Take these amounts and strike the balance, and tell me if the people in the North—the tax-payers and those who fought the battles and sustained the burdens—ought now to be made to contribute their means to repair the losses which were occasioned to the southern people by their rebellion against the Government?

Sir, if this claim is allowed and the precedent established, it will necessarily follow, in my judgment, that millions of dollars will be paid to people in the South on whose skirts is the blood of your murdered sons and brothers. I cannot, of course, form any accurate opinion as to the number; but I venture to say that thousands of men in the South contributed to create that sectional feeling of hatred which developed itself in the rebellion, and when the clash of arms came they retired and occupied a neutral position during the war. Such men can, of course, succeed in proving that they were loyal during the struggle, while they are a thousand times more responsible for the rebellion than the chivalric and impetuous youth who, under their education and influence, took up his musket and gallantly fought for what he supposed to be the rights of the State in which he was born.

Sir, it will be impossible—and that is a legitimate argument to employ here—to distinguish between the friends and the enemies of the country if you undertake to pay these claims. Taking the standard of loyalty which would be set up by my distinguished friend from the State of Kentucky, and I will ask how many of the people of the South would be excluded from a right to payment of their claims by his view of the question of loyalty? Thousands of people in this country say, and I suppose they believe, that the so-called abolition party of the North constituted the disloyal portion of the people, and that the people of the South were only fighting for their constitutional rights. If those who entertain that view of the subject, or any view kindred to that, should obtain the ascendancy in Congress—not perhaps an impossible thing—and they could resort to such a precedent as this case would establish, there would be no end to the claims, and nothing would put a stop to the expenditure of funds in their payment except the perfect exhaustion of the Treasury of the country.

I do not wish to do anybody any injustice, but I have supposed that to some considerable extent this rebellion demoralized the people, or a considerable portion of the people of the southern States. I hear of Ku-Klux organizations and men sympathizing with them. I hear of murders committed there in broad daylight, in the face of the men whose business it is to maintain the authority of the law, and the offenders go "unwhipped of justice." I hear of trials there which amount to nothing but mockery. Now, sir, suppose that a person in the South, considering that this war on our part was wanton and wicked, and believing that all the calamities which were brought upon the South by its prosecution were the work of tyranny, and that he is justifiable in resorting to any means to make himself even with the Government—suppose that such a person should prefer a claim against the Federal Government for property destroyed, how easy would it be for his Ku-Klux associates, or those who sympathize with him, or those who sit upon juries and refuse to convict when the evidence shows crime in broad daylight, to prove his loyalty. How easy to establish his loyalty by the testimony of such persons! These men have not, so far as I know, been particularly scrupulous about the means which they have employed for the purpose of redressing their supposed grievances. I do not mean to make this as a general and sweeping charge against the people of the South; but I say that the history of the day places a considerable portion of that people in this category. Make this case a precedent, and a cloud of claim agents will swarm around this Capitol, and the Government—which was strong enough to resist all the forces of the great rebellion would reel and stagger under the weight of its own rottenness.

Some effort has been made to distinguish this case from others, on the ground that the Federal Army occupied the town of Decatur, in which Miss Sue Murphey lived. Does that make any difference in respect to the merits of the claim? Is it true that wherever property was taken by the Army, in or about its encampment, the Government is bound to pay, but wherever it was taken elsewhere the Government is exonerated from payment? The Army of the Union moved from point to point through the southern States. At one point it was found to-day, and there, it is said, if property was taken, the Government must pay for it; but to-morrow it moves to another point, and the position abandoned becomes rebel territory, and at the other point, if property was taken, the Government must pay. What sort of a principle is this to introduce into the adjustment of claims from the southern States? This property was taken as a part of the military operations of the Army of the United States to conquer the State of Alabama and compel it to submit to the authority of the United States, and I say that, in my opinion, the Government is no more liable to pay for that property than it would be to pay for the grass or wheat over which the Army might march in its movements, or to pay for the wood or ground that it might take or occupy in its encampment, or the structures which it might destroy upon the field of battle.

Much has been said about the manner in which this property was taken. Military officers of the Government desired the site of Sue Murphey's house for a fortification, and so the property was torn down and destroyed for that purpose; and it is argued that those circumstances give the owner a right to compensation at the hands of the Government. To illustrate my idea and to show the fallacy of this position, let me suppose that Miss Sue Murphey owned a house in one end of the town of Decatur and Patrick Murphey owned a house in the other end of the town; coming to that town in the prosecution of the war the Union Army found it necessary to erect a fort upon the site of the house owned by Miss Sue Murphey, and they tear it down and put up the fort. Soon after a party of the enemy makes its appearance and protects itself behind the house of Patrick Murphey, and a ball or some missile hurled from the fort standing upon the site of Sue Murphey's house at the enemy destroys the house belonging to Patrick Murphey. Now, says the distinguished Senator, the Government must pay Sue Murphey for her house, but it ought not to pay Patrick Murphey for his house. Assuming that they are both loyal citizens, one is as much entitled to the favor of the Government on that ground as the other. The property of each was destroyed by the same agency; the Government of the United States destroys the house of both persons. They are both destroyed for the purpose of prosecuting the war; and in all respects, it seems to me, that the claims of these two persons stand upon precisely the same ground. Establish this precedent, and it will be very easy to extend the range of your argument, and so we shall go on, step by step, extending the jurisdiction of Congress over these claims until the time comes when they will all be embraced and all recognized as valid against the Government.

I do not oppose this claim from any feeling of unkindness to the people of the South, or any portion of its people. I desire as much as any man can to see that section of our country restored to peace and to prosperity. I was sorry to hear it suggested that if this claim and similar claims were not allowed by Congress the loyal men of the South would cease to be the friends and become the enemies of the Government. I can hardly persuade myself that this intimation has been authorized by any considerable portion of the loyal people of that country.

Mr. FOWLER. I presume the Senator from Oregon alludes to me; if he does, I wish to correct him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the remark which I have just made I did not allude to the Senator. I alluded to what was said by another Senator. I have had a high appreciation of the loyalty of the loyal men of the South, and I cannot convince myself that a loyalty which stood the ordeal of the rebellion can be destroyed by any mercenary considerations, whatever they may be; and I was more grieved to hear a Senator say to the Senate, in effect, that if these claims were not allowed by Congress every man, woman, and child in the South would repudiate the public debt. Sir, the Senator who makes that proclamation may speak possibly for the rebel part of the people in the southern States, and he may possibly speak for a class not far removed from the rebels; but I venture to affirm that there is not a negro in the South who will sanction such a doctrine.

I submit, Mr. President, in view of the considerations which I have presented, that we ought to consider well before we make a precedent fraught with so many evil consequences to the country. While I should be glad to see the losses that Miss Sue Murphey sustained fully repaired, and all the losses of every other loyal person repaired, I know that it cannot be done. I know there were losses made in every part of this country that can never be repaired, and there is no greater legal or equitable obligation upon the Government to pay the loss in this particular case than there is in thousands of other cases in which it is admitted on all hands that no relief can or ought to be allowed by the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I should not have troubled the Senate with the few additional remarks I propose to make had not the honorable Senator from Kentucky yesterday seen fit to allude to me so distinctly and frequently in the remarks he himself made. The honorable Senator but repeated yesterday the same strain of argument in which he has indulged, to my certain knowledge, to a greater or less extent since 1863, in reference to the legal character of the conflict through which we were passing, and out of which we have now emerged. For some reason or other he and I disagree very broadly as to the legal effects of that state of things which I have denominated and still denominate a state of war between the loyal portion of the United States and the insurrectionary portion. He denies that the rebel communities were in any sense enemies to the Government of the United States. He denies that they can be so treated, either in their persons or their property, if I understand him rightly.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the honorable Senator I will correct him.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. He states that I deny that the men who were in a state of insurrection against the Government of the United States were its enemies in any sense. I never have assumed any such position. I say that every man who was in a state of insurrection or rebellion against the Government of the United States was its enemy, and he was its individual and personal enemy. But such a state of insurrection did not make the State or the community an enemy; it was only the individual personally, and by himself, that was an enemy, and nobody else, unless he was leagued with that enemy.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, if none but such as actually waged war against the United States during that conflict was an enemy of the United States; in other words, if all persons who were not engaged in the actual prosecution of hostilities against this Government were friends of the Government, then the aspect of the case as presented by the honorable Senator from Kentucky changes greatly for the worse, as I will endeavor to show.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will permit me—

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. While I stand by and listen to him I will not allow him to misrepresent me. I have not said that all men who were not actively engaged in the rebellion were not enemies of the country. I say this: that every man who met the United States troops or authorities, with arms in his hands, was an open and declared enemy; that every man, woman, and child who aided and abetted them in their resistance was an enemy; but each and all of them were individually and personally enemies, and each one was responsible for his guilt and for his proper proportion of guilt without any regard to or involvement of the State or community in which he lived.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes. Let me then ask the honorable Senator a question, if he pleases. The Constitution declares that treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against the United States, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. Does the honorable Senator from Kentucky hold that all persons who did not commit that technical crime of treason were friends of the United States?

Mr. DAVIS. Does the honorable Senator desire an answer?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I never have assumed any such position.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not say the honorable Senator had assumed that position. I put him the question with a view to ascertain his views.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to the honorable Senator my position, if he will allow me to do so. It is this: every rebel, every person engaged in the insurrection, and every person who aided or abetted the insurrection, was an enemy of the country; but the responsibility of persons so offending was as individuals. They were not responsible as members of the community, of the State of Alabama, for instance. I deny that there is any such responsibility in the matter. The whole liability, the entire responsibility, was personal, and depended upon the personal and individual guilt and the extent of that individual guilt in each particular case.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well, Mr. President. Then how does the honorable Senator characterize that large portion of the southern communities who did not either wage war against the United States or render aid and comfort to the rebellion? Are they friends or are they enemies in the sense of the law? Will the Senator answer me categorically?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the honorable Senator categorically. Every man engaged in resistance by arms to the execution of the laws of the United States was a rebel to be shot down; every man engaged in resisting the execution of the laws, or aiding in that resistance, was a rebel to be prosecuted criminally for that resistance. A man who was not engaged in active, positive resistance, and that was not found in arms engaged in that resistance, was not a rebel to be shot down at all. At the same time he was a criminal, but he could only be proceeded against civilly under the law which made it criminal to resist the execution of the laws of the United States, and he could only be tried in the civil courts. That is my position.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I think my question was very distinct and perspicuous in its form; and as the honorable Senator has entirely omitted to reply to it, I take it for granted he does not choose to answer.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think I have answered the question if the honorable Senator had intellect enough to comprehend my answer.

Mr. HOWARD. I say nothing about intellect, Mr. President. I am entirely willing the honorable Senator should impute to me a want of intellect. It may be my right and my privilege to appeal from his profound judgment on that subject, however.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say "will" and not "intellect," then.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall not bandy epithets with the honorable Senator. I put to him a very plain question, sir, which he refuses to answer. There were large portions of the southern communities who did not render aid and comfort to the rebellion. Were they the enemies or the friends of the United States? He does not answer. Yesterday the honorable Senator, I thought in rather a boastful manner; but certainly I will not impute to him a disposition to boast, put me the question whether the present State of Michigan, once the Territory of Michigan, while in the occupation of its British conquerors in 1812 was enemy's territory; and he insisted that if my argument was sound in regard to the southern States during the civil war, and if they were enemy's country in the sense of public law, then the Territory of Michigan while in such occupancy was in like manner enemy's country, and that General Cass, a distinguished citizen of my State, then at Detroit and serving in the Army of the United States, although made a prisoner there, was, according to my doctrine, an enemy of the United States.

Now, sir, it surpasses my comprehension how the honorable Senator from Kentucky could have drawn any such conclusion, or how his genius could have invented such a state of facts for the purpose of replying to my argument. Why, sir, there is some slight difference between the status of Alabama during the recent civil war and that of the Territory of Michigan during the foreign war of 1812. Michigan, then organized as one of the Territories of the United States, in the peaceful enjoyment of all her political rights, did not imitate the example of Alabama at the breaking out of the war and go over and join the public enemy. That perhaps is a sufficient reply to the question of the honorable Senator. The Territory of Michigan was occupied by British troops, and was temporarily a conquest of Great Britain as one of the results of her successful military operations, but it did not cease to be the territory of the United States at all. The allegiance of its people remained precisely what it was before; they were American citizens temporarily in the power of the enemy, but were as much American citizens as they ever were; and the fact which he cites is entirely inapplicable and has no weight whatever as against the argument I have urged on this bill.

He asks, with a similar tone, when did Alabama become enemy's territory? Of course he denies—the question itself is a denial—that the territory ever was enemy territory. In short, he denies that there was a state of actual war as understood and defined by learned authors treating on the subject. Now, I will tell the honorable Senator from Kentucky how, according to my apprehension, the State of Alabama became enemy's territory, and all the property in it and all the residents within its borders became enemy's property or enemies in person. The first step toward converting it from friendly territory into hostile territory was the passage of the ordinance of secession by the representatives of the people of that State sitting in formal and solemn council. The next step was an engagement of the actual government of that State in waging hostilities—war against the United States. The honorable Senator says that these were mere individual acts; that there was no government in Alabama which could be held responsible, but that all these acts of war were simply the acts of individuals. Sir, this is not so. The honorable Senator is entirely mistaken in his view of the subject. The loyal government of Alabama was completely overthrown and expelled. It had ceased to exist. There was not a shred or a vestige of the once loyal government of the State of Alabama. It had been extinguished, absolutely annihilated by a power higher than all law, all constitutions, all written covenants, all agreements, all compacts; and that power was military violence, military force, which is the last appeal of kings and of communities; the power before which all Governments, all statutes, all treaties sink in the dust and are trampled on by the heel of the combatants. The next piece of evidence to show that Alabama was hostile or enemy's territory is found in the statutes of the United States. Shortly after this rebellion broke out, as we all know, Congress was convoked in extraordinary session by President Lincoln, and in July, 1861, passed a law which contains the following provision, under which all our military operations regularly proceeded as in the case of war. Section five of that act declared:

"That whenever the President, in pursuance of the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeat the act now in force for that purpose," approved February 28, 1795, shall have called forth the militia to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and when said insurgents claim to act under the authority of any State or States, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the function of the government in such State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which said combination exist, nor such insurrection suppressed by said State or States, then, and in such case, it may and shall be lawful for the President, by proclamation, to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States."

That is to say, the State—for there can be no distinction in law or in fact between a State or the government of a State, and the people, the inhabitants of a State, for the inhabitants and they only constitute the State; the government is but their instrument:

"And thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof"—

That is, the inhabitants of the State in insurrection, all the inhabitants without distinction, without attempting to draw the futile discrimination between inhabitants who are friendly to the Government and those who are hostile to it, and all the inhabitants—

"and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue; and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, coming from said State or section into the other parts of the United States, and all proceeding to such State or section, by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from such State or section, be forfeited to the United States."

In pursuance of that statute the President in August, 1861, issued his formal proclamation declaring that the inhabitants of Alabama, among other States, were in a state of insurrection against the Government of the United States, and forbidding and prohibiting all intercourse and trade between the people of that State and of the other States of the Union. Now, let me ask the honorable Senator from Kentucky where in the Constitution of the United States is found a clause authorizing the Government of the United States to prohibit intercourse between two States of this Union unless it be under that clause authorizing the United States to make and carry on war or to suppress insurrection? Sir, without the existence of war, called at that time insurrection, it is perfectly clear that this clause has no foundation whatever in the Constitution. This act is therefore a direct and clear recognition by Congress, acting under the war-making power and under the power to suppress insurrection, of the existence of a state of war between the loyal and the disloyal portions of the United States. Nothing can make it more manifest. It is a clear, unequivocal legislative recognition of the existence of a state of war between these communities as such, applying to that status all the incidents belonging to a state of war between foreign nations, cutting off intercourse, preventing travel even, preventing a man in the South, whether a friend or foe, from passing our lines to visit his friends in the North, and vice versa, prohibiting citizens in the North from immigrating into or trading with the rebel country.

I believe the honorable Senator from Kentucky was not in the Senate at the time of the passage of this act; but his doctrine goes to deny the validity and constitutionality of that, the first statute passed by Congress upon the subject. His denial that a state of hostility, of enmity, existed between communities, in other words, between the rebel States and the loyal States, can be based upon no other principle than that we have had no war; that the conflict through which we have passed was not subject to the rules and usages of war, and, in short, that all we have done by waging war to put down the rebellion has been in violation of the Constitution itself. He would appeal to the courts, he says, for the punishment of individuals. Well, sir, Congress took a different view of it. Congress took the same view of the then condition of things between the two sections of the country as the writers upon public law and the laws of war take of ordinary civil wars when they say that when a country is divided by a civil war, and is so divided as to comprise on each side large portions of the community, those portions of the community in the prosecution of that civil war are, to all intents and purposes, to be treated and considered as two independent, sovereign nations waging the highest controversy known to mankind for the purpose of ascertaining which is the stronger. It then becomes not a question of statutes, not a question of constitutions, but a question of superior force, and you can put it upon no other ground than that of force. Which party shall go down, is the only question; which can deal the heaviest, the most destructive blows; not which can appeal to the Constitution, nor any particular clause of the Constitution, or treaty, or statute. It only illustrates the old maxim of the common law so often quoted, inter arma leges silent, there is no "law" in a contest of arms.

Mr. DAVIS. There is no such maxim as that in the common law.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the honorable Senator has been very forgetful of his Blackstone. I would commend him, if he will allow me, to enlighten his already brilliant intellect by a perusal of a few pages of that somewhat to him forgotten author. I fear he has little regard for Blackstone, and I am very sorry to see it.

The honorable Senator insists that all acts of the so-called rebel government were absolutely null and void. He makes it a contest of individuals. He will not allow that the usages and laws of war had any place in the controversy. He holds that all acts tending to that war on the part of the rebel States were absolutely void. He goes even further, and denies that any of the statutory regulations of the rebel governments had any force or validity as law. Let me read what he says:

"Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him one question right there?"

"Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir."

"Mr. HOWARD. I understood him to say that everything that was done by the rebel government was null and void."

"Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir."

"Mr. HOWARD. Does he adhere to that principle?"

"Mr. DAVIS. I do, and I have always maintained it, and I expect always to maintain it. I say there was no government de jure or de facto in the southern confederacy."

That is at least sufficiently broad and comprehensive. I do not propose to argue that question at any length, but beg merely to say that I differ entirely with the honorable Senator from Kentucky upon that question. Sir, there were governments in the rebel States; there were legislatures in the rebel States. Those legislatures passed laws in very great numbers, to which every resident within the limits of the State owed, for the time being, at least, obedience, laws under which private rights were regulated, under which deeds and conveyances of land were made, marriages entered into, under which estates descended and were distributed, and under which, in fact, all the machinery of civil government was put and continued in operation; and social rights, the rights of property, the rights of commerce, and every other species of private right were regulated. Does the honorable Senator hold that under those laws, if one rebel deeded to another his land the deed itself was null and void? Does he hold that a marriage celebrated according to the statutes of a rebel State would be null and void in law? In short, does he hold—he is a lawyer and a good lawyer; he is a Conservative, and a distinguished Conservative—that in the southern country during the pendency of this war for nearly five years the people of the rebel States were without law? Does he rise here to inculcate that anarchy, absolute anarchy existed throughout the rebel dominions? No, sir; he cannot as a thinking, reflecting man come to any such conclusion. He must recognize the laws of war and the public law of the world, which declare that during the existence of such a rebellion, the laws passed by the existing de facto Legislature, or by whatever legislative power, must have force, and that the rights of property and the rights of person must be recognized, not only during that period, but after the close of the war, whenever those rights are called in question in courts of justice.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will tell him what my position is in relation to the point that he now makes. The States whose people went into the rebellion were members of the United States. They had their own State constitutions and governments and statutory and common law. So far as these governments of the States with their different systems of law operated in friendliness or in harmony with their relations to the Government of the United States and in subordination to the Constitution of the United States, those laws operated validly in relation to all the matters to which the honorable gentleman has referred. But so far as any legislation, any acts of conventions called in the States whose people went into the rebellion were in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or with their proper, peaceful, constitutional, and subordinate relations to the Government of the United States, they were, that far, absolutely null and void. That is my position.

Mr. HOWARD. I was entirely satisfied that the honorable Senator would find it necessary to modify the ground which he took yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not modified it; I have only defined it. The ground that I took yesterday was general. I now make a definition of my ground, and make a more particular application of it than I did yesterday, for yesterday I made none.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well. Then, in applying the general doctrine which the honorable Senator announced yesterday, he finds it necessary to interlard the text with various exceptions and limitations, does he? I thought he would. Yesterday, in answer to my question whether everything done by the rebel government was null and void, he said, "Yes; everything." Now he says some things done under the rebel governments were not null and void. I think he is right now.

Mr. DAVIS. Everything in the course of the rebellion, if the honorable Senator pleases, and in the course of resistance to the laws and authority of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. President, I will call the honorable Senator's attention to another supposititious case. Undoubtedly, the honorable Senator will hold that a rebel Legislature could not impose taxes upon the people of the State for the purpose of prosecuting the war of the rebellion. He would hold that to be an illegal act if he would hold any act to be illegal, I take it. Suppose that property had been seized at the South for the purpose of satisfying the taxation imposed upon the people of an insurrectionary State; and suppose that a tract of land had been put up at auction for non-payment of the taxes imposed by the rebel State government and had been sold to an honest purchaser for a valuable consideration and in strict pursuance of the statute imposing the taxation; I ask the Senator whether he holds that the title of the purchaser of that property under that sale would be void? No, sir, he cannot so hold. It must be conceded that private rights, where they arise out of the laws of a hostile Legislature, are to be respected even by the conqueror, and are to be respected by all courts in the future.

Now, sir, let us look for one moment at this case of Sue Murphey. I would most respectfully inquire of the honorable Senators from Alabama, who have participated in this debate, if they can inform the Senate at what time and in what manner the title of Sue Murphey to this farm accrued? Was it daring the war? Was it by inheritance? Was it by regular, formal conveyance? Or how did this transfer take place?

Mr. WARNER. I will say to the Senator that I am not able to give him the information. I do not know the facts in the case, and do not know anything about the case.

Mr. HOWARD. We know nothing about it, sir. We have no information on the subject. I have a surmise that this title came to Sue Murphey during the war. I may be mistaken about that. But if it came to her during the war and the doctrine of the honorable Senator from Kentucky holds good that the laws existing in Alabama de facto during that time were no laws, were all null and void, then I ask him how it is possible for him to reconcile it to his conscience to pay Sue Murphey for a piece of land which does not even now belong to her? If the honorable Senator is driven into that necessity, if he would pay Sue Murphey for the damages done to this land, he must be satisfied, in the first place, that she has a good title, and had a good title at the time the damage was committed. Still, according to his doctrine, if it shall turn out that she acquired the title under the rebel laws of Alabama, she has no title at all; and I fancy it will turn out that she did during that period acquire the title.

Mr. President, it is said that we are under an obligation to indemnify loyal persons of the South for damages done to their persons or property by the operation of our armies. So far as we have seen this obligation is confined by its advocates to loyal persons at the South. It has not yet been announced to us that we shall be called upon to pay disloyal persons for damages done to their property. Now, I ask those who favor the passage of this bill to listen to me for one moment. What is to be the test of loyalty at the South? How are the courts or the commissioners or a committee of this body to determine who was loyal and who was disloyal? What is the test which you will set up, what the criterion? You will find it impossible to establish any. Undoubtedly there were numbers of persons, not very large, however, in the insurrectionary States who favored the old Government, and who were at heart opposed to the rebellion. During the existence of the war ninety-nine out of a hundred of this class of persons could only remain silent. If they remained in the rebel country it was dangerous for them to open their mouths. They were silent. They dared not do an act in favor of their old Government nor say a word in its favor. The best that can be said of them is that they were neutral and silent, friendly to the old Government at heart, but timid and inefficient in its defense. They stayed at home enjoying their property, maintaining a discreet silence, but at the same time trading with the rebels at home, carrying on their business there, making money, and amassing fortunes.

Still they were, as it is and will be said, "loyal." You would pay this class of persons for damages done to their property; you would reward them for being silent on the ground that they were "loyal," as you say, while at the same time they have contributed by way of taxation, and perhaps in other modes, to the prosecution of the rebellion. Their property has been the fund from which the rebel Government has drawn support and supplies. They have enjoyed all the advantages of peace undisturbed—peace in the midst of a rebel population. You would pay them for the damages and the ravages of the war. Why? Your only answer is that they were silent and had at heart a friendship for the old Government. On the other side of the street is living a man, and has been living there during the whole of the war, who has maintained also a discreet silence, who also has done nothing but to contribute in the shape of taxation to the prosecution of the war, but who in his heart was a rebel, sympathizing with the rebellion and desirous of its ultimate success.

I ask gentlemen upon what principle of justice or law it is that you will draw a distinction between those two cases? Will you pay the Union man who has done nothing and said nothing for the damages which he has sustained, simply because he has done nothing and said nothing, and refuse compensation to the disloyal man, because, not having done anything, not having said anything, he entertained in his heart the desire that the rebellion might prove a success? Sir, you can never draw any such distinction either in law or common sense. If you pay the one you are bound to pay the other, because your only real excuse for paying the one is that the public necessities required the damage to be done to his property, and the same necessity compelled you to take the property of the other, the silent rebel on the other side of the street. It makes silence the test, and under this rule both are equally deserving.

Sir, I am entirely opposed to the adoption of any such principle. The whole southern communities were drawn into the war by their own consent. The fortunes of the minority necessarily followed those of the majority. If there were Unionists there of such undaunted pluck and of such desert as represented, how did it happen they remained in the enemy's country during the whole of the war? Why did they not make their escape? Why did they not sell their property and come out from among the rebels and show themselves men?

Mr. President, I can never be brought to adopt any such general principle as the one embodied in this bill nor any such doctrine as that which has been promulgated here in the Senate upon the subject of these claims. I tell you, sir, the time is not far distant, if this claim shall be allowed, when you will have uncounted thousands of claims in the name of loyal citizens of the South, but who during the war belonged to that silent class who did nothing and said nothing against either party, but who during the whole of the rebellion extended their sympathies to the rebels in the field. You will, in the course of twenty-five years or less, be called upon to pay every dollar of damages done to the property of all classes of persons, loyal and disloyal, at the South. And gentlemen will come here from the South, having the same feelings that members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives have had at other times, who for the sake of popularity, for the sake of getting votes and influence at home, will become the advocates even of rebel claims on this floor.

I concur entirely with the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the question of paying such claims has been substantially settled and decided by the people of the United States in the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. He pointed out attention to that clause which prohibits Congress from paying for slaves. The clause itself goes further. It declares that—

"Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void."

This clause destroys in the pocket of Sue Murphey the confederate bonds, if she has any, and deprives her entirely of any claim growing out of those bonds or any other species of indebtedness which she may have received either from the confederate government or the government of the rebel State of Alabama. They cannot be enforced in any court of justice. They are declared to be illegal and void. Now, sir, what is the difference between depriving her of that species of property, rendering it entirely useless and valueless, and our withholding from her compensation for damages done to her freehold in the regular operations of war, when it is perfectly plain that the necessities of the service required the destruction of her house and the erection of a fortification upon its site?

Mr. President, I was a little pained to hear yesterday remarks falling, some of them from the honorable Senator from Kentucky and some from other gentlemen who advocate this claim, indicating a disposition on their part to accuse members of this body of illiberality and indifference to the sufferings of the Unionists in the rebel States. This accusation comes with a very bad grace from the honorable Senator from Kentucky. He says we were living in our quiet homes in the North and saw nothing of the ravages of that dreadful war, and seemed to intimate that we were almost indifferent spectators to what was passing. Are the gallant people of my State amenable to such a charge as this? Why, sir, the very property, the very house of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, was defended and preserved by the strong arms of my own neighbors against the violence and ravages of the rebel columns and the rebel raiders.

Who defended the property of the Union men at the South? Was it Kentucky that defended the property of Kentuckians? To a very small extent, sir. But for the courage and gallantry, the bone and muscle, the resoluteness and the determination of the neighbors of Kentucky, Kentucky herself would have been swept into the vortex of the rebellion and would have become as thorough a rebel State as there was in the confederacy; the property even of the Senator from Kentucky might have been swept away by a rebel raid or a rebel confiscation. And the same may be said of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Unionists at the South—ay, sir, even rebels at the South—who during the first stages of the war were protected most scrupulously, and I will add most ridiculously, in the enjoyment of their property by the Union forces, acting under mistaken and erroneous instructions, are to-day indebted for their estates to the forbearance, as well as the courage of the Union troops.

Sir, let us hear no more of the indifference of northern men to the sufferings of southern Unionists. It was northern men who rescued them and saved to them their lives and their liberties. It was northern blood and northern treasure that put an end to the rebellion. And are we now to be met with charges like this, and to have superadded to them a threat that in case we shall not vote to pay off the damages done to Union men in Tennessee and elsewhere our present friends there will turn around and vote for repudiation? Sir, let the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FOWLER] go back to his constituency; let him go into East Tennessee, where the suffering has been most intense, where the courage and gallantry of Unionists has been most conspicuous, most admirable; let him go before the inhabitants of East Tennessee, who were scattered and persecuted as no people ever were for the cause of the Union, and preach the doctrine of repudiation to them. My apprehension is that they would laugh him to scorn. He would find no sympathy in the heart of any Tennessee Unionist, however great may have been his losses and sacrifices during the war. I have a higher respect for southern Unionists than seems to be entertained by him or by the honorable Senator from Kentucky.

Sir, we have all suffered in this war. The southern Unionists while within the enemy's lines have suffered far less. Let me tell you, than any other class of persons. They have remained at home as a general thing. I do not say this of all of them. I know that the southern Unionists have displayed upon occasions great determination, great patriotism, and that they are worthy of the highest praise; but, as a general proposition, I say that no class of persons have been so little disturbed and so little tormented by the recent rebellion. The mass of them remained at home taking no part in the war. They paid no taxes to support the Government. They could not do it. They were exempted by being in the enemy's country from that burden. But instead of paying taxes to their old Government, the rebel governments have levied taxes upon them and they have paid them, thus aiding by their property in assisting the rebellion. This was one of the necessary results of their territorial situation. If they remained in a rebel State they were obliged to submit to the laws of that State and to contribute their proper proportion to the support of the rebel armies.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say upon this subject. I hope, as this is a pioneer case, a specimen case out of which is to grow the established policy of this Government in reference to this class of claims, that the bill will be recommitted to the committee, and if necessary with instructions to report more particularly the facts connected with the case in order that we and the country may see the whole of this argument on both sides, and be fully informed upon it.

Let our friends who bring against us this imputation of being unkind to southern Unionists be a little cautious. Southern Unionists, as I have already remarked, are not the only persons who have suffered in this war. Let them be still more cautious how they invite persons at the South who are rebels, and have been rebels, to present their claims to Congress and ask payment for the destruction of their property; for that will be the next step—a short, but an inevitable step. I am free to say, Mr. President, that I would prefer to see this war waged over again, to see it fought out for four years longer, before I would submit to the humiliation, the absolute disgrace, of calling upon my people, the very soldiers who carried their victorious arms into the South, to contribute of their property to pay rebels for damages done by their own operations in the field! Sir, you may rely upon it the northern people will never submit to any such proposition. I warn our friends from the South to tread lightly, very lightly upon the toes of the northern soldiers who fought our battles. Do not ask them to pay the rebels for damages done to their property which they found it necessary to do in the honorable prosecution of the war to crush out the rebellion. Do not ask them to cover themselves with an infamy so enormous.

Mr. SAWYER obtained the floor.

Mr. FOWLER. With the permission of the Senator from South Carolina, I desire to make a personal explanation in reference to a matter that occurred here the day before yesterday. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] read a letter from a Mr. D. Humphreys in relation to Miss Sue Murphey's claim. At the time the letter was read I did not recall to mind any Mr. Humphreys of Decatur, and I asked the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] who he was; and he gave me such an answer as fully warranted me in making the statement that I did. Since that time I have learned that I had met Mr. Humphreys and had entertained kindly feelings toward him and done him some service. I know nothing personally about his position in Alabama. I still retain my abhorrence for his improper course relative to the letter with regard to Miss Sue Murphey. He has given me to understand that it was written without due consideration. I hope that he may receive no injury from the statement made, and which I take pleasure in correcting. My knowledge of the character of the Senator from Alabama fully warranted me in making my statement, as I have implicit confidence in whatever he says, knowing him to be a prudent man and well disposed toward the people of his State and of the United States.

INAUGURATION BALL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from South Carolina proceeds the Chair will lay before the Senate a resolution of the House.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That so much of the Capitol as is hereinafter mentioned be granted to the committee of control, in which to conduct the inaugural proceedings, other than official, of President and Vice President, on the 4th of March next, to wit: the Rotunda, the old Hall of Representatives, the Senate corridors, and Senate public reception room, the passages leading thence to the Rotunda and old

Hall, and so much of the basement not used by the committees as may be required; the Senate Chamber, Hall of Representatives, committee-rooms, and all other parts of the building to be closed to the public, except the east entrance to the Senate; the occupation not to take place until after the official inauguration, and the building to remain all the time in charge of and under the control of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that resolution may as well be acted upon now. It is rather important that it should be settled one way or the other.

Mr. HOWARD. Let us pass it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will briefly state the facts with regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent it can be taken up now. If there be no objection it is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Maine is on the floor proposing to explain what it means. I should like to hear the explanation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate will pass it without explanation I shall be very glad. I do not desire to make one.

Mr. GRIMES. I want one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have already considered it, and they are all but unanimous. There is one member who has some doubt about it. The others are in favor of passing the resolution. They see no objection to it. I hope it will be passed.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it for?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is merely to allow the use of certain parts of the Capitol for the proceedings.

Mr. GRIMES. The ball?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume it includes the ball.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire what this reception is to be, whether it is to be a ball or not. We may as well talk it out in the English language and have it understood.

Mr. POMEROY. It is the inauguration ball.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa call for the reading of the resolution again?

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have it read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the committee have reported the resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; the committee have not reported it. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were consulted in relation to the matter and came to the conclusion that it was not within their power to authorize the use of so much of the building, and they recommended therefore that an application should be made or a concurrent resolution introduced to see what Congress would say to it. But the committee considered the subject, and of the House members on the committee all were in favor of it, and of the Senate all but one. Now, sir, I will state the reasons for it. There is no building in which these ceremonies not official can be had in the city.

Mr. WILSON. Does it mean a ball?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I mean a ball, the inauguration ball. There is no doubt about what is meant, and I do not know why it is not so expressed.

Mr. SUMNER. There is the Patent Office, which was used four years ago for this purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been used several times; but is now occupied.

Mr. NYE. That is full of things that do not dance. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, it is now occupied, so that it cannot be used for this purpose. The truth of the matter is simply this: they must either erect a building on purpose or they must use the Rotunda of the Capitol.

Mr. POMEROY. Is there any law requiring these services? I mean, are they obliged to have them?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If public opinion and public sentiment are a law I think there is a law requiring that there should be an inauguration ball.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator will see that this resolution provides that these rooms shall be all the time under the control of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses. Whether that means all the time, forever, or only during these services I do not know. But we have a rule that the Presiding Officers shall have charge of the building.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a sharp verbal criticism that will have what effect it may, I suppose, upon the minds of the Senators. I am stating the fact. Now, sir, they cannot afford very well, they say, to erect a building, as has been done, I believe, on one or two occasions, for this purpose; it would cost too much and make the affair too expensive. They therefore make this application to Congress. I am assured that it is to be under the control of gentlemen who will not allow any liquor to be brought into the Capitol or to be used on the occasion; and inasmuch as this seems to be a necessary part of the inauguration ceremonies, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, all but one of them, thought it would be as well, under these restrictions and under the charge of the proper officers of the two bodies, and having a police to take care of the building, to let them have the use of it. For myself, although the day has gone by for me to go to balls, I have no sort of objection; and I really see no impropriety, no unfitness, inasmuch as it is a very necessary and useful part of the ceremonies of inauguration that it should be in the Capitol, considering the occasion, under proper restrictions and regulations. That influenced me in agreeing to it; and I suppose it influenced other gentlemen of the committee. It is, however, for the Senate to decide. Of course, it is a question in which the committee feel no personal interest.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope we shall not pass this resolution. It seems to my mind to be altogether wrong. I am not willing that the Senate of the United States shall become a part of the pageant for the inauguration of anybody as President of the United States. I remember hearing the older men in the Senate say that when Mr. Jefferson was inaugurated, he ordered his horse to the door, mounted it, rode up to the Senate Chamber, took the oath, and that was all there was of it. He tied his horse out here to a stake in front, and came up to the Senate Chamber to be sworn in, and I think, having the opinion of General Grant that I have, he would much rather do that than have a thousand soldiers leading him up to the Capitol, and coming in here and having a grand ceremony.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMERON. I would rather not yield to a question from my friend, because I am afraid I should not be able to answer it, he is so smart. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I should like to know if there is anything in this resolution to prevent General Grant coming here in the same way and hitching his horse to the same stake if he can find it? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly there is, because you invite him to a ball. I remember perfectly well the disgraceful scene that occurred here nearly four years ago. If the matter had all been settled in a quiet way we should not have been disgraced, nor the country dishonored, nor offense given to the foreign diplomats who were here.

Why should we have a ball at the inauguration? It is perfectly right that those who are fond of dancing should have a ball in honor of the ceremony of General Grant's inauguration; but let it be in some other part of the town; let it not be a part of the pageant which the Government brings forth for that occasion. I am perfectly willing to pay my share; I suppose it will cost ten or twenty dollars apiece; and I will go there with pleasure if it will add anything to the dignity or the honor of the occasion. But I hope we shall not give a vote here which will make it a part of the official programme which inaugurates the President of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no; the language of the resolution is "proceedings other than official."

Mr. CAMERON. It will be official if we pass this resolution. You may call it unofficial, but it will be official; and after awhile some President-elect may come here and direct that we shall give him a ball here; that we shall open the Halls of both Houses and receive him as the conqueror of our liberties. I am not in favor of that. There is no good that can come out of it. I was just as anxious that General Grant should be elected as anybody else was, and I trust he will live long to do honor to the place, as I have no doubt he will; and I trust I shall live to see him inaugurated a second time; but I am not in favor of opening these Halls to any ball or any dancing party, especially when there is to be nothing on the occasion to make us joyful. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIMES. That is contrary to Pennsylvania rules. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly it is. The good old Presbyterians of Pennsylvania always had something to make them joyful on joyful occasions. [Laughter.]

I trust, sir, that this resolution will not pass. It is all wrong. If there is to be a ball let it be given by the people of the city. Do not let us give it an official character, as we shall do by this resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the yeas and nays were to be called on this resolution I should content myself with simply voting against it; but as it seems about to pass without any division, I wish to say enough to show that I am opposed to the adoption of any such resolution. I think it exceedingly inappropriate to surrender up this building for a dance and a ball to be given on any occasion, and to turn it into an eating-house. It is said that no liquors are to be brought into the building. I apprehend liquors will be found very near the building, if not in it; and the scene which will be very likely to follow from the crowd and the rush and the victuals that are prepared in the building, I think, will be found not to be very creditable to the Congress which grants the permission. Like the Senator from Pennsylvania, I think it altogether inappropriate, and I am sorry the application has been made. It will be the opening and the beginning of such things. If it is granted now it will be followed up, and probably not only on occasions of inaugurations, but on other occasions applications will be made to have balls in the Rotunda; and how are you going to refuse them? It will be very unpleasant to vote against such applications.

I recollect some years ago applications were made for this Hall, and, I believe, on one occasion it was granted to some lady to lecture in. My friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] perhaps, can remember the occasion. [Laughter.] The Senate, however, became so dissatisfied with it that I think we passed a resolution that it should be allowed no more; and I do not know but that we would pass such a resolution after this is granted. I shall take up no time in regard to it, but thinking it inappropriate and improper, that it will lead to scenes that we shall be likely to deprecate, I, for one, shall vote against granting it.

Mr. POMEROY. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. Being a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which this matter had been brought before the introduction of the resolution here, and having concurred with the majority of that committee in the opinion that the resolution might properly be passed, I wish now to state very briefly the reasons why I came to that conclusion.

I think it is a good thing to have a merry-making at the inauguration of our Presidents. I think our people do not have days of holiday amusement enough for their good. I believe the day of inauguration is a very appropriate time. I believe that the inauguration ball, which has been customary for a great number of years, as I am informed, may be conducted in such a manner as not to lead to any of the scenes which Senators seem to deprecate, and that it may be conducted so that no harm, but positive good, will ensue from it as an addition to the occasions of relaxation, of which, as I have said, I think our people have too few.

The resolution does not propose to occupy either of the Halls of Congress, but simply the Rotunda and the old disused Hall formerly occupied by the House of Representatives. The refreshments are to be below, prepared by the caterers, where they are prepared every day now and every night when we have evening sessions. The building is to remain under the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, and it has an efficient police. If the inauguration ball does not take place here and under this supervision, it will take place in a structure put up for the purpose, and without supervision, or without, in my judgment, as effective supervision. I think, therefore, that it is better, as it has become a part, as it were, of the proceedings of inauguration day to have such a festivity, that it should be done in this manner; and I see nothing in the character of the building as a public building which should lead us to vote against such a proposition any more than we should have voted against allowing the use of the Patent Office on a former occasion.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand it there is no question whether there shall be a ball in honor of the inauguration. That is not the question; but the question is whether the ball shall be under the Dome of the Capitol. Now I must say—I may be in error; and when I see the tendencies of Senators about me, I am led to infer that I must be in error—but it does seem to me that this proposition is bad in itself and is worse as a precedent. Where will you stop? Forever hereafter on inauguration day the Dome of the Capitol is to cover a ball-room. Prepare yourselves for it. If you vote it, bear in mind the precedent that you adopt. Do not expect that the precedent is to be restrained to inauguration day. There will be other occasions. People will wish to dance on other days than inauguration day, in honor of some victory, some other incident of life; and you must be prepared then either to vote that they shall, or to deny it, and, if you deny it, to make a distinction between the two cases.

There was an old patriotic saying which our fathers borrowed from their English ancestors; and it was "oppose beginnings," obsta principis; and I incline to think that on this occasion it may be properly applied. That is one of the very arguments which have been sounding in this Chamber during the last week with regard to a famous claim of a person by the name of Sue Murphey, of the State of Alabama. Many of us oppose it on the ground that it is a bad precedent, that it will open the door wide to infinite claims on the Treasury; and now from that bad precedent we pass to the consideration of another of a very different character, but which I regard also as bad. I hope, sir, that the Senate will not adopt the resolution.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I am very sorry for one to feel obliged to protest against a thing of this kind. I think it is in exceeding bad taste that it has been brought here. When I was a member of the House of Representatives a resolution was passed there shutting up the Hall of Representatives against all services except religious services, aside from legislation. And now from the same House has come to us a resolution proposing to open the old Hall of Representatives and the Rotunda under the Dome to a dancing party. I do not object to dancing on proper times and proper occasions; and it may be very well to dance on inauguration day, but I do not think it is best to do violence, if you please, to the prejudices of any part of the people of the United States by opening the Capitol to amusements of this kind. There are other places in the city where this merriment may be carried forward.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are none.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Then, sir, I would pitch a tent; and if there is not a tent wide enough I would dance under the tent of heaven rather than to dance here in the Hall where the nation enacts its laws. I think, sir, it is doing violence to the prejudices, to say the least, and to the sentiments of a very large and respectable part of the people of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I suppose all Senators will desire that the incoming of the next administration shall be celebrated with all the ceremony which usually attends such a transaction. I desire to bestow the same honor on General Grant and Mr. COLFAX in coming into office as has been bestowed upon the great men who have filled those offices in time past. With a view of satisfying myself just how far we ought to go—I have not investigated the subject—I desire to inquire of the Senator who champions this measure whether any part of the Capitol has ever heretofore been made a dance-house?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, as the dancers do not seem to have any particular champion here I propose to enter the lists myself. [Laughter.] My venerable friend on my left, [Mr. SUMNER,] and my still more venerable friend on my right, [Mr. CAMERON,] undoubtedly twenty years ago would have voted for this proposition cheerfully. [Laughter.] They having passed that age which I have just arrived at, I propose to let them dance, and let them dance in the Rotunda. I am sorry that my friend from New Hampshire should have had his religious prejudices aroused, because dancing is an old religious custom. There was dancing before the Ark. The Israelites danced after crossing the Red sea; they danced and sang under the temple that my friend proposes to dance under, which would be very well if it was warm weather, [laughter,] the canopy of heaven. They sang and felt good and would have enjoyed the Rotunda if they had had it.

Now, it seems that this is about the only place in this city that is suited to the occasion. I believe that this proposition goes a little further than what has been heretofore. On the occasions to which I have referred liquor was not excluded; but I am willing to keep a place for the accommodation of my friend before me, [Mr. WILSON,] and have no liquor in the Capitol except what persons bring in concealed about their persons. [Laughter.] I do not think there is any danger in that.

From the first inauguration of Washington to the present time there has been dancing at every inauguration; and they will dance when my friend and I have ceased to be.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the honorable Senator whether they ever danced pursuant to act of Congress, or danced voluntarily? [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I will relieve my friend from any trouble on that score, as I know he does not dance; and I would be willing to relieve him from voting upon the question. This is not dancing by act of Congress, but it is a congressional permission that they may have the Rotunda to dance in, a common hall. These gentlemen who come here to dance own just as much of this tabernacle as we do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask my honorable friend if there is not a very large portion of the people of the United States who do not dance, and who do not wish to pay their money or have their property used for public balls?

Mr. NYE. No; I think not, Mr. President. [Laughter.] I deny that proposition. I think a very large majority do desire to dance; and when they get so old they cannot dance themselves, they desire to see others dance. I speak from some experience on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I ask the Senator if he would not admit an amendment to the resolution; to have the "Black Crook" performed here? [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President, we have had shows here for a long number of years, and my friend has been an actor in one to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Yes, sir, and the clown is now playing his part. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I would not have theatrical shows here, but on the day of great national festival, on a day of a great triumph for human freedom, on the day of the elevation of the champion of the cause of liberty, old as I am, I shall be quite inclined to dance myself, and I think the spirit of the nation is such that the people will feel like dancing. I propose to let them dance. The idea that it will bring any dishonor on the Rotunda to allow dancing in it under the well-regulated management of the officers of the two Houses, is too ridiculous to think of. We have seen worse exhibitions than dancing here—[laughter]—a great deal worse than that can possibly be. I do not believe my friend from Wisconsin, although I know he does not dance, has any religious scruples about other people dancing, if they please.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the honorable gentleman that I have no scruples about allowing those to dance who desire to dance; but I do say that there is a large portion of the American public, the religious public, who do not believe in and who have religious scruples against public balls. There is the Presbyterian church, there is the Methodist church, there is the Baptist church, and there is the Catholic church also, so far as the advice and action of the clergy of that church are concerned, opposed to public balls. Now, the question is shall those people, who own this Capitol just as much as those who desire to dance at public balls, be taxed. Shall they pay the expense of this arrangement? Shall their building be used for that purpose? May it not wound their sensibilities?

Mr. NYE. Possibly. I suppose I may speak on that point, for I was baptized a Presbyterian; I have been judicially declared a Baptist; I am by habit an Episcopalian, and by inclination a Methodist. [Laughter.] Therefore I am prepared to say a word on the point now suggested. I think, embodying all these creeds, I have a right to speak for them all. I know there is a sort of objection among Presbyterians to public dancing; but go to their houses and they will dance you blind. [Laughter.] So with the Episcopalians; so with the Baptists; and so with the Methodists. Therefore, I do not believe they will be greatly shocked if there should be a ball in the Rotunda of the Capitol. I hope, Mr. President, that the festivities of that occasion will not be marred or the old traditional custom broken in upon because there is no place in the city of Washington, the great capital of the nation, to hold this ball. It will not hurt this Capitol. Now, I rather think that after all what grieves my friend from Wisconsin most is that he is going to dance for the inauguration of Grant.

I hope now, sir, we shall reach the question and take the vote. Let us have a dance. My friend from Pennsylvania and my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Wisconsin need not go unless they choose; but I fancy they will be there if it is held, to give dignity and honor to the occasion and to prove that the several churches are not against it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say but a single word. I, of course, did not favor the election of General Grant, but I give my honorable friend from Nevada to understand that I do not desire in any respect whatever to take anything from the joy of his friends at his inauguration, and I have no disposition to prevent those in Washington who desire to take part in the inauguration ball from doing so. The only question with me is the question of propriety, of setting the precedent of opening for such purposes the Capitol, which belongs to the whole people, when we know that there is a large mass of the American people belonging to the churches I have named, although my honorable friend may claim to belong to all of them; who would not lend their sanction to public balls.

Mr. NYE. I saw people dance in the streets here when Lee surrendered, and I danced myself, and I believe the Senator from Wisconsin did, too.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe the Senator from Nevada was hardly just in his reference to me. I did not object to a ball, but I did object to a ball under the roof of the Capitol; and I have another strong reason why I oppose this resolution, which I will state to him. I do not believe in a ball where there is nothing to make it joyful. A dry dance is no dance at all, according to my notion. I want the ball to be somewhere in the city where the young people can go and enjoy themselves, and where the old people can go and take something that will warm up their blood—something stronger than ice-cream—not spirits, for I will not run counter to the ideas of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] but a little "generous wine." It helps the old and the young.

But, sir, I entirely disapprove of making this Capitol a place for pleasantries of any kind. It is set apart for the legislation of the country. I will go so far as to agree to walk through the first dance with the Senator from Nevada, if he desires it, for I should be honored in walking through with him; but I object to making a precedent which will for all time compel us not only to give this building for dances at inauguration time but for other purposes. I repeat, I would rather have no military pageant here. I should greatly prefer to have the President-elect ride to the Capitol in his carriage or on horseback, or walk if he thinks proper, and come into this Chamber and receive the oath of office as other men do. I would not establish this dangerous precedent. Why appropriate this Capitol for the purpose? It will cost but a few dollars to get a place to dance in, as has been usual heretofore; and if we desire to encourage it why not appropriate the money from our own pockets? I would rather appropriate money, if gentlemen think it right, from the public purse than to make that grand old Hall which the great men of the nation honored by their presence, which is made sacred by the eloquence of the men who established this Government, a dancing place to which all may come. I hope we shall not pass this resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, had the yeas and nays not been ordered on this resolution I should have been content to withhold the impression which it makes upon me; but as I am called upon to vote by the yeas and nays, I beg to state the reasons which will lead me to vote against its adoption.

The people of this country have managed since the country began to inaugurate their Presidents and conduct inauguration balls without bringing them into the Capitol of the nation. The question is, now, whether it is worth while by force of this resolution to select, in the first place, the most ill-contrived, the most inconvenient, I might say the most impossible place to conduct proceedings of this kind, and say that they shall take place there; and at the same time bring them into that building which, as has been truly said, pertains in its proprietorship alike to all the people of this country.

Something has been said about public opinion. If I were to govern my utterance by what I believe to be the public judgment I should venture to state two conclusions: first, that General Grant could swear into office and enter upon his duties without any ball at all, and the proceeding would be entirely satisfactory to the American people; and second, if a ball is to occur, that it could take place conveniently and appropriately outside of the Capitol; and when it occurred that arrangements would be more satisfactory, whatever place might be selected, than it would be to have it occur in the Capitol of the nation. I think that is what public opinion would affirm, and that is what my judgment affirms. It seems to me that this resolution is in the worst taste and most obnoxious to criticism in point of propriety of various kinds. Therefore I shall vote against it, and if it fail the ball will occur no doubt, as it has occurred heretofore, in a more appropriate and, I think, more convenient building.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no sort of feeling about the matter at all. I do not care whether the resolution is passed or not; but I feel bound to defend the committee against the charge which has been made of exceedingly bad taste in allowing it to be brought in here. Matters of taste are a great deal matters of opinion, and they depend very much on the individuals. For myself, I could not see any objection when the application was made to me individually, to these ceremonies, if you please to call them so, being held in the Capitol. We all know what an inauguration ball means. It means this simply: that on this occasion a great many gentlemen and ladies from different sections of the country come here as to an occasion of rejoicing and from curiosity; they like to meet each other; they like to have some place where each can see the other and get acquainted and enjoy the occasion. The mere ceremonies of the inauguration are nothing. For that reason heretofore it has been the habit always to have something of this kind. I see no harm in it, and I never heard that any complaint was made by any religious denomination on account of it. Some of my friends about me, who seem to have very strong feelings on the subject, whose religious sentiments are terribly outraged—my excellent friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] among the number—with reference to this matter think it would be a very shocking affair to desecrate the Capitol of the nation by having ladies and gentlemen meet there from different sections of the country to interchange congratulations and the amenities of social life, get acquainted with each other; and if there should be a band of music there and some of them should like to dance gentlemen think that is a very humble affair to take place in the Capitol of the nation!

Well, sir, I do not dance myself and never did. I never go to balls; I never went to an inauguration ball in my life, and never expect to go to one. I believe I was a manager of one once, though I did not know it until I saw my name on the card; but I recollect that on cards for inauguration balls I have seen the names of the greatest and best men that our country has produced as managers on those occasions, the very best and the very ablest and most eminent men of all political parties. They did not seem to think there was any very great harm in providing for the meeting of persons on such an occasion. When I submitted the matter to the committee there were two gentlemen on it out of the five who happen to be Democratic in politics; and I found them both ready to say that they thought it was a very proper thing, indeed, and they gave their assent to it with a great deal of pleasure. There was no argument about it one way or the other. Having that instruction from the committee, I had the bad taste to suggest that all the members of the committee but one agreed to it, and that all the committee of the House agreed to it. Shocking "bad taste" they had, some gentlemen think.

Now, sir, what is the harm? We have a building here which may be used for this purpose. It is not proposed to open these rooms in which we meet; but we have a Rotunda, and we have a large hall, which was the old Hall of Representatives. These parties wish the use of them for the purpose of having this social gathering of people from different parts of the country. I may be exceedingly obtuse, and my moral and religious sentiments may be very shocking, but I do not think that anybody will be harmed by it. If gentlemen's feelings are so very acute that they cannot witness that desecration of the Capitol by people just as respectable and as good as they are, then all they have to do is to stay away in case the thing should happen. I do not know that General Grant will be present. It is not exactly a part of the ceremonies of the occasion, but it is about as sensible as a great many of the ceremonies that we do vote money for. This does not call for an appropriation. These people propose to pay the expenses of the ball themselves. For my part I really think that the committees of the two Houses, when the question was stated to them, came to a very sensible conclusion, not only that it was proper to have this social gathering, but that it was very appropriate, as they ask to give these people the use for one evening of the Rotunda of the Capitol for that purpose; but if the Senate shall decide otherwise it will be quite as satisfactory to me.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I am not opposed to dancing, and am ready to take a part in it when it is not scientific. I could join my friend from Nevada or the Senator from Wisconsin in a reel or a cotillon; and I would be willing to hail with gladness, with songs of joy, with bonfires, with illuminations, the inauguration of General Grant as President of the United States; but, sir, I do think, really, that the Capitol of the United States is not the place for dancing. It is against the religious sentiments of the country, or at least a large portion of men whose feelings we should respect. This is the theater for legislation, for high and grand debate, not the place for dancing. Let us keep the Capitol sacred for the purposes for which it was designed. It is outside of the Capitol that dancing should take place. I shall certainly vote against the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not wish to say anything that shall cast reflections on the committee that have brought this matter here. I do not think we ought to do so, but I believe that they and all of us will see that this is a mistake if the resolution shall be adopted, and therefore I hope it will not be. Some persons say here that they are opposed to it on principle. I believe there are men in Congress who are opposed to it on principle, and there are a great many people in the country who will accord with them and go further than they will. There are many sacred memories about that old Hall; people feel them; and in that Rotunda less than four years ago a murdered President lay, and tens of thousands of the people passed by to gaze on his face for the last time.

I do not think that that old Hall where John Quincy Adams fell on the post of duty, and that Rotunda where a murdered President was brought, should be converted into dancing halls. If we want to dance let us have a building erected, as was done, I think, when Mr. Buchanan was inaugurated. We know very well what these balls are. I remember something about them, and remember some of the scenes of the last one. Some high officials were there in a condition not very creditable to themselves or the country. Although it is proposed here that there shall be no liquors allowed in the building, you will find liquors will either come in in bottles or come in in some other way. A gentleman who was once in the Senate, Mr. Nesmith, on one occasion spoke of the wonderful capacity of some man on the Pacific coast to throw himself around a pint of whisky; and I think we shall find on that occasion there will be a great many persons here who will have great capacity for throwing themselves around whisky. I think that the thing had better be let alone. This matter had better be dropped, and I believe we shall all be glad of that determination. If we pass this resolution I think we shall all regret it, or most of us will regret it after the resolution is adopted.

Mr. MORTON. I have no prejudice against dancing or against balls, and I think it not at all improper that there should be an inauguration ball for the purpose mentioned by the Senator from Maine. I myself rejoice as heartily in the election of General Grant as any other Senator, and I should be glad to see the occasion a festive one, a joyful one; but, Mr. President, there are proprieties in regard to time and place. That which may be perfectly proper in one place may not be proper in another. I do not believe that there is propriety in having a ball in the Capitol of the United States. I believe it would be essentially in bad taste, and would be so regarded by a large portion even of those who are fond of dancing and think there is nothing wrong about it. I think there would be just as much propriety in asking the vestry or trustees of any church in this city to allow the use of their church for a public ball or for an inauguration ball as to ask Congress for the use of the Capitol. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote against this resolution. It will be drawn into a precedent on other occasions, and will be a precedent for asking the Capitol for many other purposes beside inauguration balls. We have had inauguration balls before and it was never thought necessary to hold them in the Capitol. They can be provided for outside of the Capitol just as well now as upon former occasions.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, who, I believe, was Secretary of the Interior at the time, how much it cost to put the rooms of the Patent Office in repair or in a suitable condition for work after the ball which was held there?

Mr. HARLAN. The part of the Patent Office building occupied by the public for a ball was not at that time completed; it was the north wing of the building, but other portions of the building had to be opened to enable the public to get access to the hall. I was not at the time Secretary of the Interior, and was not present, but afterward there were bills paid for repairing the furniture and fixtures in that part of the building which had been completed and was occupied by the officers of the Government. I do not now remember how much they amounted to; I should think not to exceed from two to four thousand dollars.

Mr. SUMNER. Repairs?

Mr. HARLAN. Repairs of the furniture and plastering of the walls and things of that kind.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think this is quite too important a question to be decided to-night. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no. Let us vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. Senators all around me say they are ready to vote, and ask me to withdraw the motion. I do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Howard, Kellogg, McDonald, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Spencer, Stewart, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, and Williams—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Cameron, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Vickers, Warner, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Drake, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Osborn, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Tipton, Welch, and Whyte—13.

So the resolution was rejected.

REPRESENTATIVE REFORM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment of the select Committee on Representative Reform—Mr. BUCKALEW, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. FERRY, Mr. MORTON, Mr. WARNER, Mr. RICE, and Mr. WADE.

COUNTING OF PRESIDENTIAL VOTE.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint the teller on the part of the Senate, provided for in the twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses, to receive and count the votes for President and Vice President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the rule referred to be read.

Mr. CONKLING. The twenty-second joint rule covers everything except that it does not provide for the mode of the appointment. This resolution is simply to give the power to the Chair.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the rule be read.

The twenty-second joint rule was read, as follows:

"The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next, succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their Presiding Officer; one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected; which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. If upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no question shall be decided affirmatively and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses; which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately reassemble and the Presiding Officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted, and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House; and any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner. At such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: for the President of the Senate, the "Speaker's chair;" for the Speaker, a chair immediately upon his left; the Senators in the body of the Hall, upon the right of the Presiding Officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not occupied by the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform. Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any of such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner herebefore provided, to direct a recess, not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock p. m."

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall, if I can get the floor, move to postpone the Sue Murphey bill with a view to take up the bill reported by me chartering some companies to build railroads. I do not desire to argue it now, but I give notice that I will take the sense of the Senate to-morrow on the question of taking it up if I shall get the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I make this motion with the consent of the Senator from South Carolina, who is entitled to the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Unless the Senator has something special in view I object to the motion. It is twenty minutes after four, and it is too late to conclude any business in executive session to-day. If the Senator wants an executive session for any formal purpose, as, for instance, to make a report, I shall not object.

Mr. POMEROY. I withdraw the motion now, but I give notice that to-morrow, at half past two o'clock, I will call for an executive session.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order this morning is the unfinished business pending at the adjournment last evening, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) extending the protection of the United States to the republics of Hayti and San Domingo. This resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] who is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

CHARLES E. DOLE.

Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1674) for the relief of Charles E. Dole; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RELIEF OF POOR IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the House take from the Speaker's table the bill to appropriate money for the poor of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill (S. No. 693) for the temporary relief of the poor and destitute people in the District of Columbia will be taken from the Speaker's table for action at the present time.

Mr. McKEE. I object.

COST AND INCOME OF UNITED STATES MINTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust the House will consent to adopt at this time two resolutions calling for information which is desired by the Committee on Appropriations. The first is the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish a statement of cost of the mint at Carson City, Nevada, with estimates showing the cost of running the same, and the revenue to be derived therefrom; also, the cost in detail of running the several mints of the United States, and the income received from the same.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

NORTHWESTERN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the House the total amount expended for the United States northwestern boundary commission, and to give in detail the items of expenditure, the number and names of the persons employed in such commission, how long employed, and at what salaries, and the nature and extent of the services performed.

BELLE R. DAVIS.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1675) for the relief of Belle R. Davis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARY AND ALICE DAVIS.

Mr. KERR also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1676) for the relief of Mary and Alice Davis, minors; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ADAM HARDT.

Mr. KERR also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1677) for the relief of Adam Hardt; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SCOTT AND BRINDLEY.

Mr. KERR also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1678) for the relief of Scott & Brindley; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

S. S. POTTER.

Mr. KERR also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1679) for the relief of S. S. Potter; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

INDIANS IN DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to Indian affairs at Fort Randall, Dakota Territory, and asking an appropriation for additional supplies; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN INVASIONS IN TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of the constitutional convention of Texas, requesting the Congress of the United States to call into service a regiment of Texas cavalry to repel Indian invasion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES W. W. BOLTON.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Committee of Claims the papers in the case of James W. W. Bolton, for the purpose presenting the same to the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. HULBURD and Mr. VAN AERNAM.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. DAWES. I present the credentials of Mr. JAMES T. ELLIOTT, elected to fill an existing vacancy in the second district of Arkansas. He has had his disabilities removed by act of Congress, I understand. I move, therefore, that the oath of office be now administered to him.

Mr. JAMES T. ELLIOTT accordingly appeared, and was duly qualified by taking the oath of office required by law.

NORMAN WIARD.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the select Committee on Ordnance, submitted a report in writing on ordnance contracts, and reported a bill (H. R. No. 1680) for the relief of Norman Wiard; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I do not desire to take any advantage by reporting this bill now, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAYTI AND SAN DOMINGO PROTECTORATE.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday, being joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) extending the protection of the United States to the republics of Hayti and San Domingo; on which Mr. BANKS was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I have very little to offer in addition to what I said yesterday. The resolution has been printed and is before members of the House. It proceeds upon the theory that the Government and people of this island desire the protection proposed. I stated yesterday that I was not authorized to say that officially, though I believed it to be true. I wish to say this morning, in the most emphatic manner, that an appeal has been made to this Government for action of this character. It is upon the strength of that appeal that this resolution has been presented.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask in what shape that appeal comes.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to go further than the statement I have made.

Mr. CULLOM. Is it made by the Government or by a portion of the people of that island?

Mr. BANKS. By parties authorized to speak for the Government and people. I make the statement this morning that the action proposed proceeds upon the fact that such an appeal has been made. I did not say this yesterday, but I do say it now. I do not wish to trouble the House further with remarks upon this subject at the present time. I do not wish to limit discussion. I desire the House to take all the time upon this subject that in the present condition of business it can accord to it, confident as I am that the more it is discussed the better it will be understood and the more strong will be the judgment in favor of the action now proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I desire to say, however, that I propose before action is taken, if no other member shall move in that direction, to submit an amendment which will preclude any possible danger of armed intervention by the United States in the affairs of the island or that shall involve us in any question of armed force as concerns that people. I now yield, to allow my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire that the amendment should be considered as pending?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following as a substitute for the joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to extend the protection of the United States over either of the islands of the Antilles to such extent as he may deem expedient and not inconsistent with the laws of nations whenever the government established in either of them or the people thereof shall desire such protection of the United States: Provided, That any action in this behalf on the part of the Executive shall be forthwith reported to Congress: And provided further, That no payment or expenditure of money in carrying this resolution into effect shall be made or contracted for without previous authority of Congress.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BANKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to insert after the word "Antilles" the words "or any other islands in the Atlantic or Pacific oceans which lie nearer to the coast of the United States than to that of any foreign Government."

Mr. BANKS. I will yield to my colleague who introduced the substitute to debate it if he pleases. I only desire to say that it stands on a different principle from that of the original resolution. While I do not object to it if the House chooses to extend it, I do not wish to be understood as approving the substitute.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the House for one moment to the amendment which I have proposed. The original proposition is that whenever the Governments of Hayti and San Domingo desire the protection of the United States the President of the United States shall be in a condition, by the authorization of Congress, to extend it, provided that it shall not involve the United States in any breach of treaty obligations or expenses. The amendment which I have offered extends this right of protection to all the islands of the Antilles; and the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] proposes to extend the principle to every island adjacent to our territory on either shore, looking, I suppose, to the Sandwich Islands, if the time shall come or is ripe for most of these islands coming under our protection. The amendment that I have offered proposes that wherever in the islands of the American seas any body of men associated together under the forms of government desire the protection of the United States the President shall have a right, in his discretion, to extend that protection. I cannot help looking forward to the immediate future, and not a far-distant future, when the whole system of government in the islands of the Antilles—whether the Governments of Denmark or of Spain, or the republican governments there—will crumble to pieces, and the islands will go out, by natural process, from under their former governments. And they belong to us so far by position and by the laws of nature that it is required for us to interpose our good offices to aid them to come to us and under our laws.

Let me say here that no question of feeling against the present Executive or what the Executive may do should influence any gentleman on this question, for this power is needed to meet a case that may arise when we are not in session. When we are in session we can at once advise or restrain movements in this direction as we choose. There is now a revolution going on in Cuba in which we can take no part until the people of that Government have put themselves in a position to receive our protection by conquering their own independence, and then we should be in condition to assert our traditional doctrine, known as the Monroe doctrine, that there must be no unwilling dependencies of a European Government on the American continent. I call the attention of gentlemen who represent States that are interested in having the Mississippi river open to the navigation of the world to the fact that it is necessary to the full enjoyment of that navigation that we should have a right to extend our protection to our commerce in all the islands of the West Indies.

Let me say further that we have by our action put ourselves in a very anomalous position in regard to some of these islands. Our Executive called upon Denmark and asked to have the people of St. Thomas vote whether they would belong to Denmark or to this country. That people voted that they preferred to belong to this country, and thereupon they seem to have shut themselves off from Denmark, while we are not yet ready or willing to ratify the treaty by which we agreed to pay money for that island. And let me say to this House that by my proposition I do not look in any degree toward paying any money for any island or other land on the American continent. As I opposed the purchase of Alaska, so I should oppose hereafter the purchase of any foot of soil. But the question now is as to extending the protection of a republican Government. Gentlemen may ask, "Do you propose armed intervention?" To that I answer that the resolution carefully and expressly guards itself, by providing that the intervention or protection shall not be inconsistent with the laws of nations, violating no treaty stipulation and no national right. How such protection can be extended within the laws of nations is perfectly well settled by almost every text-writer that treats upon that subject. Therefore the simple question is this, to put it in plain, homely language: shall we have our mouths open ready to catch the plum which is now ripe and ready to fall, or shall we keep them shut and permit it to fall in the mouths of others?

And a word further; that for one I think the time has come for action upon this subject. This project cannot be met successfully by the assertion that there is no precedent for it. Sir, there is no precedent for our position in the history of the world. There is no precedent for our power. There is no precedent for our influence on this continent. But there is a precedent for us in every act of this Government toward the young republics of South America, in every act extending a helping hand to every people desiring either a republican government or a stable government under republican forms. And I trust that we shall not throw cold water upon the effort for the emancipation of slavery in Cuba, whether white or black, upon the efforts toward good government in Dominica and Hayti, and upon the disposition of those islands, so valuable in a commercial point of view, to put themselves under our protection.

I have listened to the amendment of my very conservative friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] I know that he only desires to add to this resolution so that possibly the Sandwich Islands, and perhaps some others in the Pacific ocean, may be brought within its scope. Now, while I do not mean to antagonize the propositions submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which I shall support if I cannot get my own adopted, still I desire that we shall make this a general provision, putting in the hands of the Executive the power to act; provided he shall pay no money for purchase, shall incur no expenditure, and do no act unless he immediately reports to Congress, and especially that he shall do no act contravening the law of nations.

Mr. DELANO obtained the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to say a few words upon this subject.

Mr. DELANO. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. SPALDING. As I have offered an amendment to the substitute moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] I desire to say a few words. I think I have oftentimes said upon the floor of this House that I was impressed with the belief that it was the destiny of the American Government to spread itself not only over the whole continent of America, but over all the islands adjacent thereto. And I believe this: if there be anything decreed in the councils of Infinite Wisdom it is this very fact. It is merely a question of time.

Now, sir, I do not say that it is sound national policy at this time to adopt any resolution upon this subject. But if we adopt any resolution to any extent, then, I say, let us open it wide enough to embrace acquisitions from either ocean, the Atlantic or the Pacific. And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] does me no more than justice when he says I have reference to a cluster of islands in the Pacific ocean in which the work of disintegration is now rapidly going on. The pear is nearly ripe enough to fall, and when it does fall it must fall into the American lap.

I ask, therefore, that the members of this House, and especially those who are interested in the prosperity of the Pacific coast, vote for my proposition, which is in accordance with the spirit engraven upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] It strikes me, sir, that the proposition is sufficiently guarded. We incur no risk of expense; we incur no risk of a breach of a treaty of peace or of any neutrality laws. We guard against that by the provision inserted by the astute gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in his substitute. The President can only extend this protectorate when the application comes voluntarily from the people interested, and without infringing any law of nations, any treaty, or any neutrality law. No money can be expended except upon application to Congress. No armed force can be employed but by the authority of Congress. The resolution being thus guarded, I, as a conservative man, (the gentleman emphatically says I am "conservative," but upon this subject—perhaps it is the only one—he will find me more radical, I trust, than himself,) will go "as far as he goes the furthest." I shall vote for the amendment to the substitute; I shall then vote for the substitute as amended, and for the original resolution.

Mr. DELANO. I yield to my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] for as long a time as he may desire.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I have not sought the floor upon this extraordinary proposition because of any supposition that the views I may submit to the House will be either new or useful, but simply to indicate why I cannot support either the original proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or any of the amendments that have been submitted to the House. It is conceded both by the chairman and by other gentlemen who have spoken that this proposition is extraordinary—not only extraordinary in the common sense of the term, but so extraordinary that it is unprecedented in the history of this Government. That a proposition thus unprecedented should be brought into the House at this time, unapproved as it is by any committee of this House, and sought to be disposed of as this one is sought to be, is to me rather a subject of surprise.

Let us for a moment or two examine what this proposition is. In its substance and effect I understand it to be a proposition by which the power, the force, the authority of the Government of the United States shall be transferred by Congress to the Executive of the United States, to be exercised under his unrestrained discretion in "protecting"—that is the operative and significant word of the resolution—in protecting the governments or the people of those islands indicated in the resolution. If it does not mean this it means just nothing at all. The Executive is to be authorized to protect these Governments or these people. Now, in the first place, I ask my fellow-members to consider what that word protect involves and means. If there is to be protection extended it must be a protection to be found in something, or else, as I have said, the resolution is meaningless. I shall assume, for the purpose of what I have to say, that it does mean something. That protection, Mr. Speaker, can be given by the exercise of the authority of this Government in the only way in which that authority of the Government can be exercised; that is, by the force which is found in the protection of the military and naval authority of your Government. You have no other way of "protecting" them than this. That moral protection which is to be found in the mere adoption of resolutions, in declarations of sympathy or of approval or disapproval, or which is to be found in the ordinary instrumentalities of diplomacy—such moral protection is clearly not the protection meant. Then, sir, it comes to this: a proposition that we shall now protect by the military and the naval authority of this Government the peoples of these islands or their Governments.

I know there are "salvos" in the latter part of the resolution, requiring that the President shall submit to Congress his action in the matter, and also a proviso that it shall cost us nothing. But I submit that these provisions and salvos in the resolution of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, if it were not introduced by a gentleman so honorable, so ingenious, so frank and outspoken, might be denominated a "spring to catch woodcocks;" and it would, I think, be a very young woodcock in legislation that would be caught by that which is appended to this resolution. It is to cost us nothing, is it? We by the resolution solemnly decide that these Governments and their people shall be protected, and then there is an authorization to the President to extend that protection. It is to be effectual; it is not to be meaningless, but it is to be protection, and the President is demanded by the high command of the two Houses of Congress, speaking in the imperial voice of law, to attain that high end, the protection of these peoples and Governments. And then we admonish him that this execution of our high command shall cost us nothing!

First the action is to go forward, the protection is to proceed; the befriended Government is to be, by our commanding guardianship, made perpetual. This is the thing authorized by the resolution. When the protection of this Republic goes to these new wards of the nation it goes out under the sanction of Congress given in a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress. We command the President, in all the emphasis and meaning of that word "protect," but protect so that it shall not cost. That is what the resolution, it is averred, comes to. But, sir, the resolution means that there shall be an effective thing done under it, and that thing cannot be less than that this Government shall protect; and by the resolution we agree that all the costs and consequences involved in giving that protection and in making it good and perpetual against all who may come to forbid, come either from the people there or other nations.

Suppose that the President has done this thing—has protected; that our Navy has been used for the purpose of this protection; that it has been sent there and has done what amounts to protection, and it has involved expenditure, who would vote that that protection thus authorized, thus expensive, shall not be compensated? Bring it back to its original elements and I submit to the gentleman who introduced the proposition that it comes to this: that it is a declaration of war on the part of the Government of the United States against somebody—nay, sir, against everybody who may come to forbid our protection. I admit I do not know who we declare the war against. The resolution does not inform us whom it is we are to protect against. What that belligerent is that we are to fight is not indicated. But if it means something, as it does, it means that this Government shall embark now, here to-day, in that protection that can only be given by war in favor of somebody and against somebody, in favor of everybody whom the President—mark it—whom the President may deem it fit to make this Government the ally of, and a war against everybody who may be the enemy of our, or rather the President's, ally and ward.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know that it may be old-fashioned, perhaps "stale and unprofitable," so here to do; still I will venture to bring my own mind, and so far as my feeble effort may enable me to do so, to bring the minds of my fellow-members back to those rules of national obligation, of wisdom, and of duty touching our foreign policies and affairs, upon which your Government was founded and upon which it has ever since so sublimely endured. Not long ago, within the memory of all of us, an old man fell stricken with death within the space now reached by the sound of my voice. That old man was young once, and when a boy he indicated and in letters gave to his country and mankind that which passed afterward into immortality in the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country. The great intellect of John Quincy Adams originated, matured, gathered into the forms and force of irresistible argument and precept the doctrines of that most approved, most cherished, and most loved part of the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country which admonished his countrymen against the intervention of this nation in the affairs of others, and against all entangling alliances—that policy which was first announced by your Government on the 25th of April, 1793, in the proclamation of George Washington, declaring the neutrality of this Government as between the French Government and the people of Europe. To the intervention in these affairs our people were then impelled by all the promptings of sympathy and of gratitude toward our recently, the people of France. The policy then and there inaugurated, I say, is one which I earnestly pray may be in our country perpetual, and for which I feebly beg. This Government, sir, may be strong in itself, may be irresistible in itself, may, God grant, be perpetual. But, sir, that immortality is to be found in our being to ourselves and for ourselves a Government of ourselves; not involving or embroiling ourselves in or interfering with the affairs of other Governments. That policy thus inaugurated has continued from that day to this. We have by our moral forces, which are growing into omnipotence, given our cheer to the struggling everywhere. Let us give it to-day to these people, to any people, to all peoples struggling for their rights, for the right. It is in that sublime moral power of your Government that you have found your controlling forces for good.

I beg, then, that the House shall pause. It is a feeble Power, perhaps, against which our guns are now to be by this resolution pointed, or whom we may now challenge to the determinations of war. But, sir, it is not the feebleness of the Power, but the potency of the precedent, that I now comment upon. To that I point; against that I implore my fellow-members to be on their guard. Be warned! The first step is here—is to-day. The last is—where? In departing from the inculcations of the fathers of the Republic, when they told us to let foreign wars alone, we embark on new seas—seas you and I have not explored. I pause; I fear; I refuse to go.

Mr. Speaker, I sympathize, as you do and as every member does, with the struggling everywhere. We want republics to be established all over the world. If we take care well of our own Government we become, as was well said the other day, the light-house to the other Governments of the world. In that light, given in the honor, the justice, the power and the glory of this Government, will be found the moral power which is to furnish the true, the real and effective protectorate of the struggling or the feeble or the threatened republics of the world. That moral power is to be found in adhering to the old land-marks. I am unfashionable; I am unprogressive; I am out of style when I come back to that immortal address of the Father of his Country; but there I leave my remarks, here I leave my admonition that this is the beginning—if it is to be a beginning, which God forbid!—of a bad ending that will come out of this threatened departure from what we were taught by him whom we all yet cherish and love.

Mr. DELANO. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MULLINS.]

Mr. MULLINS. I do not know that it is within my power to enlighten this House touching this question that is under consideration. I may be permitted to say that it is, of all the questions that have come up here since the assembling of this Congress for its last session, the most important that has addressed itself to my consideration. In the five minutes allowed me I cannot, of course, dwell upon the subject in detail. I must come up to the main features that present themselves to my mind. We are not a city that is to be buried. We are a city set upon a hill, whose light should not be hid under a bushel, but should shine forth that the nations of the earth that are living in darkness and bondage may see the light and look to us as their great light-house. And where do we hail from? We hail from an ancestry that God, in my opinion, has destined should spread its light over the whole earth and break the chains and fetters of empires, kingdoms, and dominions. And we will not only break those chains and fetters, but we will ride in grandeur and triumph. We spread out our arms like seas to those who are in fetters and bondage, and say "Come to us, and we will give you protection." We do not propose to fight their battles. That I believe is contrary to the fundamental principles, as has been indicated by the gentleman who has just preceded me, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] As was wisely declared by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] we put a stopper on this thing of buying territory. We define this position to this people adjacent to our land, to the great people here in the United States; and I declare, as I have a right to do, that in my opinion this is the new Jerusalem that comes down to us, [laughter,] and it will be the gathering in of all nations, showing its light to all. It is a harbor for all the ships that are not only to crowd around the Old World, but to come from there here.

Let us say to these little islands and to these people, we sympathize with your republican Governments as the fundamental principle of life that God has ordained when he established the garden and covenanted with man, that man was a moral free agent, and no monarch, king, or despot is decreed of God to domineer over the world. Let man in his own consciousness of right speak to these islands in darkness, and let them know that they have a friend here who sympathizes with them. And when the people, the fundamental strata upon which stands the Republic of the United States, shall respond to the will of the people of these islands, then they come to us as ripe fruit, and I would not let them lay there after they are ripe and become sour and spoil.

I for one will say this: that rather than go into war with these lands and this people I would let them alone; they will come to us themselves. Let us under the auspices of this resolution, that covenants nothing but friendship—no blood to be spilled, no gold to be paid—it is a mere expression of the will of the American people, that we sympathize with them. They will feel it; they will get the knowledge; almost as a spiritual thing; it will be received by them as a sympathetic cord that reaches across from them to us, and will draw them here naturally when they are ripe. If there was a destiny of God in the formation of this Government—and I declare that the Governments and the nations of the Old World are held in check by it—then it is that we shall inhabit this land and all adjacent to it. This Saxon people are a burning meteor rushing on in space, and their empire is land and dominion upon earth. Five hundred years have given them empire over a portion, and five thousand more will give them the whole world.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DELANO. How much of my time now remains?

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-seven minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. DELANO. I will yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD.]

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I recognize and subscribe to this doctrine of manifest destiny as connected with our surroundings as strongly perhaps as any gentleman upon this floor. I think the influence of our institutions is not to be limited simply to the territory that now belongs to us, but that in the process of time, if our Government remains stable and perpetuated, it is to extend to other lands, and I have no doubt but that influence will, by its own momentum, peaceably and consistently with all our engagements with other nations, bring these islands as well as the territory adjoining us within the embrace of our institutions. But it is with me a question of what is the proper manner in which to make our influence felt, and to spread that influence to these islands and to other portions of the earth.

I freely confess that I listened to the able remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BANKS] on yesterday for the purpose of getting, if possible, at some reason for immediate action, and of obtaining information and facts, if there are any, that are in the possession of any Department of this Government showing the necessity for any action at the present time. The chairman of the committee [Mr. BANKS] replied that there was no information that could be given to the public. His mode of reply certainly left upon my mind the impression that there were some negotiations that for some reason could not be submitted to this House. It is due to the legislative branch of the Government that it should be fully advised as to what is going on in the executive department when called upon to invest it with these extraordinary powers. With annexation vast expenditures may follow in the train of the proposed action, and this House is called upon to invest all these in the executive department in advance.

It is not a year since these halls resounded with denunciation, in which, I think, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] took part, taking exception to the secret diplomacy of the executive branch of the Government, under which and without the knowledge and assent of Congress territory was acquired, large liabilities incurred, which Congress must meet, and new populations introduced into our system. And all this by the executive branch of the Government. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country were struck with amazement at the pretense and claims of this branch of the Government. Having apparently involved the honor of the nation, Congress was compelled under this cry to ratify such doings.

In objecting to these propositions I do not lose sight of the fact that such propositions when properly presented to the Congress of the United States, who hold the purse of the nation and the power of war—by responsible parties who have an interest in a stable Government, and ask for protection—will deserve the consideration and action of Congress. I freely confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have no such confidence in executive power as to be willing, under this resolution or any other, to delegate to it powers that properly and rightfully belong to the legislative branch of the Government.

It has been truly said by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] that we do not know where this thing may lead. We do not know what interests may operate with the chief of the State Department to involve this Government, if not in a war, in an acquisition of territory which, if submitted to Congress before the making of this proposition, would not have been tolerated for one moment. My objection to this proposition at this time is that it contemplates the delegation to the executive department of a power which we cannot control, and which, by and by, under action which may be taken either carelessly or by design, may involve this Congress and this nation in consequences such as have been described by the honorable gentleman from Ohio. We ought not to delegate to the Executive the power of recognizing Governments in foreign countries, and especially in cases where there may be a dispute as to which is the rightful Government, and the additional power after such recognition to bring the power of this country to settle such contest. Such discretion ought not to be delegated to any one man in the nation. I am not so fond of extending executive power, and we have no information that any exigency exist calling for such action even by the legislative branch of the Government. As the gentleman from Massachusetts said yesterday, we are to give our moral support to the Government in the island of San Domingo. Who is to select the authority that is to be sustained when there is internal dissensions and revolution? According to the propositions in these resolutions, it is the executive department only that is to determine the question which is the rightful Government. Where there are two conflicting interests, where there is a Government (established under revolution; if you please) based upon republican principles, who is to determine whether the whole power of the Government shall be thrown into the one scale or the other? It is the executive department. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I dare not trust this power to the Executive; I prefer that it should be retained in the hands of the legislative branch of the Government. Let such questions be determined by Congress; and the Executive, in carrying out the determination of Congress, will reflect the will of the people.

Mr. DELANO. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] for three minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I intend before the vote is taken to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I propose to insert before the word "Hayti" the word "Ireland."

The SPEAKER. Such an amendment would be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution with the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts and other amendments proposed will refer, in its phraseology, to "islands lying adjacent to the coast of the United States;" and as steam-power and the telegraph, particularly the telegraph, have made Ireland the most adjacent country to us in that part of the world, I desire that Ireland shall be protected. Her claims to our protection are higher than those of any other country. The blood and the heart of Ireland are in this country. Her people are brothers of ours and aliens to the Government which has usurped control over that country during seven centuries of oppression. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the time will come when Ireland will be annexed to this country. I have no more doubt of that than I have that Cuba will be annexed to this country. Both of them will come to us by the natural laws of affinity, by their sympathy with us upon questions of politics and statesmanship. In the natural course of things, Ireland will become a part of the United States and will be represented upon this floor according to her population, and in the other end of the Capitol according to the number of the States of which she may be composed.

I have intended to take the floor upon some proper occasion to make a lengthy statement of my views on this subject. We want no war with England. We shall have no war with England. We shall obtain possession of Ireland peaceably. Her heart, as I have said, is here. She is a burden upon England—always has been, and always will be. The heavings of revolutionary feeling under British rule will continue. England, so long as she attempts to hold Ireland in subjection, will have no peace; she ought to have no peace. The people of Ireland and the people of the world will give England no peace. God Almighty, who rules the universe, will give her no peace until she lets the people of Ireland go; and the natural affinity of Ireland is with the United States.

Mr. DELANO. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add but a word or two in answer to what has fallen from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] who so eloquently and urgently asked our attention to the words of the Father of the Country. I believe they are in the manuscript writing of Alexander Hamilton, and I have not been so loyally his follower all the days of my life as to think that all intelligence and all progress in national affairs died when he did. I am inclined to think that we must adapt our legislation to the power and to the position and to the influence which we, as a nation, have now, and not to the power, not to the position, not to the influence that as a nation among the nations of the world we had in 1793.

Sir, I have no fear of war. The fourteen hundred thousand veteran soldiers that we disbanded when we ended the rebellion, on one side alone, and I doubt not that even the confederate soldiers, would rally around the old flag now against any foreign foe. I say that fourteen hundred thousand settled the question of war between us and any other nation, so long as we are true to ourselves and our own honor; and this nation will never do anything not consistent with that honor. We are strong enough to do right, we can appreciate the right, and no nation will go to war with us unless we are ourselves in the wrong.

Again, sir, I desire gentlemen to think whether or not we shall wait in our action because we may not have special confidence in this man or that man who may be at the head of the executive department or of the State Department. I want gentlemen to arise above all that as legislators and as men having the guardianship of the great interests of this country, looking forward to what is to come in the future, knowing that we are able to restrain any action that is wrong on the part of the Executive. Rising above all considerations, except that of statesmanship, I want gentlemen to see what is best for this country, and what is best for republican institutions throughout the world. And can any man say here in his heart that he doubts that within a short time, ay, a very short time in the history of nations, these islands must belong to us? Then, if this House answers that question in the affirmative, must we not further say that we ought to be ready to extend protection over them; and I do not by any means intend to belittle that word "protection." It is the protection which the strong can give to the weak without the former being involved in the affairs of the latter. It is the protection which the powerful always gives; the protection which only a united, prosperous country can give to a weak and divided one. And in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDG.] allow me here to say that it is to give to the Executive of this Government some right to determine between these factions now destroying themselves and destroying American interests in these islands that I desire this protection. I say I fear not that we shall be involved in war thereby.
